In light of how other controversial posters have been greeted at Williams in the past, one shouldn't be surprised that posters put up by the Feminist Alliance, Williams For Choice and Housing Now have been defaced already this fall. What is surprising, however, is the college's utter silence on the issue. The Dean's Office has said they will wait and see how the situation develops, but it is not clear just what they expect to develop. The posters, after all, have already been torn down.

Last year, when vandals defaced posters expressing both conservative and liberal viewpoints, Joan Edwards, acting dean of the college at the time, sent out two all-campus mailings expressing the college's strong disapproval of all acts of intolerance. President Oakley, too, emphasized the importance of open campus dialogue at this fall's class meetings. Why does the administration now seem to be sidestepping these very issues, in clear contradiction to its stated policies?

If the deans are remaining silent on this matter for fear of being associated with a particular political position, they are acting hypocritically. The point behind their past mailings was to condemn student attacks against any group, regardless of its ideology. So why is the college now ignoring groups whose views, while controversial, are certainly an accepted part of the American political debate?

Assistant Dean of the College Andrew Hernandez implied in an interview with the Record last week that the college feels that just "another letter from the Dean's Office" would be ineffective in deterring vandalism. He is missing the point. Whether or not a letter from the Dean's Office would actually deter aggressors is less significant than the fact that it would communicate a message of the school's support for freedom of speech for all of its student groups.

Furthermore, some careful wording could make a simple letter much more of a deterrent than in the past. For example, the deans could send out a much stronger message by explicitly listing disciplinary actions that could be taken against students caught committing acts of vandalism.

Hernandez has said last week that the Dean's Office wants "to proceed in a way that promotes dialogue and discussion." Silence, however, is not the answer. It does not promote dialogue. It does not protect freedom of speech, and it certainly does nothing to prevent such acts of vandalism from recurring.

Letters

Don't forget women's rugby team

To the editor:
Regarding the article entitled "School wants rugby to toe the line" and the editorial "Rugby club should try diplomacy" — catchy titles, but both pieces were shallow investigations of a problem which affects 150 students or approximately 8 percent of the student population.

The first and perhaps most flagrant error of the two pieces was their refusal to acknowledge the Women's Rugby Club. Though not as large as our male counterpart, the women's club is nonetheless a vibrant organization comprised of nearly 50 members. We, too, are affected by the administration's policies. We, too, have a president, yet no one from the Record contacted her for information or comments.

The second error is not one error but rather a set of prejudices and stereotypes. Both article and editorial and indeed the athletic department wish to classify rugby players as pseudo-athletes who are prone to (to quote the editorial) "conspicuously outrageous behavior."

I will freely admit that we are not the average team: we don't have cuts, every-one plays and we don't get taped for free. However, we are a team but, more importantly, a network of friends. Although beer practice seems to threaten many "serious" athletes' conception of what a sport entails, it brings us all together on a Friday night — emphasizing not the competitive ideals of a varsity sport but the camaraderie of a team sport. We play hard on Saturdays but Friday night reminds us that winning isn't all there is.

If the Record, the athletic department and the campus at large wish to stereotype rugby players as male, beer-guzzling, Animal House refugees, then so be it, but let us be aware of the prejudice that is occurring. The editor is wrong that we are unwilling to compromise; we accepted six o'clock beer practice and we want to work to make our campus relations better, but we will never sacrifice our spirit — Nihil In Moderato.

To the editor:

It has often been remarked that we students of Williams College lead quite sheltered lives during our years in the Purple Valley. It is all too easy to turn the page when we read in the paper that the federal housing budget has been cut more than 78 percent over the past eight years. We might never notice the statistic as a sign in that there are three million homeless Americans on the streets right now. We do not need to deal with these facts in our day-to-day lives. For most of us, they are not a reality. There are those of us, however, who feel that our government has a responsibility to these people to provide quality, affordable housing, which at the present time does not exist. On October 7, people from all across the nation will gather in Washington D.C. for a rally called Housing Now! to demand that this issue be addressed seriously in order to resolve the present crisis.

We, the members of the National Student Campaign Against Hunger and Homelessness, urge you to join us as we join this national rally for a cause that has been too long overlooked. Transportation to and from the rally will be provided for anyone interested. Contact Steve at 458-5130 for more information. Your input may make the difference.

Correction

Last week's story on the filing of a civil-damage lawsuit against the driver of a car involved in an auto accident that claimed the life of Assistant Professor of Political Science Richard Krouse contained an error in the headline.

Patricia Leach was not involved in the suit by the Horace Mann Insurance Company against Mark Miller, the driver of the car which allegedly hit Krouse's, and Joann Powell, the owner of the car Miller was driving. Barry O'Connor, the lawyer quoted in the article, represented Horace Mann and not Leach.

As stated in the article, the suit was filed because of a lapse in the payment from Miller's insurer to Horace Mann. Leach later told the Record that she was in no way involved in the suit.

The Record's Op-Ed department welcomes letters and submissions from all interested readers. Letters should be legibly written and no longer than 500 words. Articles must be typed or word-processed. Fascistic Fronts or glorious revolutions? Parenti is wrong about Baltic States

by Tony Ellison

During a four-year stint in my idyllic Purple Valley, education comes in many forms — learning by lecture, cramming with caffeine and tutorial tete-a-tete, just to name a few. Somewhat rarer is the moment of spontaneous intellectual stimulation, fueled by emotion and morality. Such heightened awareness, when it comes, is often effected by exposure to a Global Issue through discussion or actual participation.

Michael Parenti's talk, given in Brooks-Rogers on September 20, about "Perestroika and the Problems of Socialism," brought one of those Greater Causes to life. Rather than addressing the subjects implied in his lecture's title, Mr. Parenti chose to raise some interesting points regarding several often-overlooked successes of socialism and failures of western capitalism.

Citing numerous worldwide examples, he presented the latter system as an exploitative, imperialistic regime of hypocrisy. His arguments were enough to arouse in me the sort of righteous social consciousness usually found on this campus only in small circles or U2 song lyrics.

However, my great Something to be Angry About was in no way due to Mr. Parenti's powers of persuasion, arousing sympathy for the victims of American hegemony. Far from championing global human rights, Mr. Parenti showed a remarkable double-standard in his vituperations which, stretched to an extreme, had me empathizing for a

I asked Mr. Parenti a short question after his lecture about his thoughts regarding recent independence movements in the Baltic Republics of Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia. His reply not only surprised me, but dismayed me to the point of speechlessness.

The Baltic States, he said, had "little or no right to independence (in spite of their individual languages and cultures); the independence fronts were "fascistic"; "social justice" was a reason for preservation of the Soviet Union.

Perhaps Mr. Parenti's finest hour came when he made a comparison of potential Baltic secession to that of the American South. His twisted metaphor was, I hope, the result of simple confusion and not any failure to recognize the Baltic Republics' forced annexation into the USSR. Had he been on the lecture circuit 50 years ago, would he be calling for "social justice" in the preservation of social justice? In the preservation of Czechoslovakia as a part of the Third Reich?

It was Ronald Reagan who termed the Soviet Union an "evil empire," and the light of glasnost, his sentiment seemed inappropriate. One thing which, however, should not be forgotten (in spite of headlines proclaiming the end of the Cold War), is that the Great Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is still an empire in a very literal sense.

Recent nationalism in the Baltic States seems to be just the sort of thing for which the freedom-loving American government would express enthusiastic approval, but official restraint is evident in the recent reproach of Vice President Dan Quayle after his voicing of American support (perhaps his most sensible public statement to date).

And this apathy continues through the media to the masses; the United States is hardly distinguishing itself as the Leader of the Free World when Japan's Asahi Shimbun continues to give Baltic independence frontiers top international news priority, while the New York Times has relegated such articles to its middle pages.

Perhaps it will, indeed, be the Japanese who, in their eagerly-awaited debut on the international political stage, will have the honesty and resolve to break Gorvachev's war of international politics and dispel his enchantment of Europe. Japan itself has long-standing territorial disputes with the Soviet Union; addressing these issues along with a statement regarding the Baltic question could prove Japan to be a political entity of its present economic magnitude. Inconceivable as this scenario seems, it still provides a spark of hope in my new idealism, what better solution could I, as one of two Japanese-Lithuanians on this globe, hope for?

The flume: more than a dishwasher

by Dan Silverman

Picture, if you will, the year 3989 A.D. Archaeologists are sifting through the ruins of the lost civilization of Williams College. Near broken mirrors and shards of ceramic at the site of Hopkins Hall, but south of dozens of aluminum barrels found at the Mission Park excavation, this future search team has discovered the cult figure whose image and power it seems dictated the culture and formed the ethos of the ancient Ephpeople. Its name...Baxter Flume.

The flume, also known as "The Beast," is a dishwasher and waste processing system built by the Adomation Corporation of Waltham, Mass. Williams College Food Service implemented the flume in 1984 to reduce the amount of solid food waste being sent to landfills, according to Jim Hodgkins, Director of Food Services. But to the average Williams student the flume means a great deal more than a six hundred percent reduction in solid food waste.

The experience of fluming is something all Ephs share. It is a common link between students and, some say, a major source of energy for the Williams spirit. Whether they are amused or disgusted by the rushing of brackish liquid and the occasional belching of a piece of tofu, many say they find a feeling of camaraderie with their fellow flumers.

Williams culture is deeply affected by the flume. The noise, lines and varying techniques associated with the fluming process make a profound difference in the lives of Williams students.

For example, the flume can often determine when a student decides to end his or her meal. Many students try to anticipate the ebb and flow of the flume line and finish eating at the exact moment when the line should be shortest. However, when one diner makes the move it is often followed by a tremendous rush of eager flumers each hoping to beat the line and make class on time.

Students look to the flume for guidance in other social matters. More than one Williams relationship has begun when a couple was brought together by the timeless romance of a "flume your roommate" date.

Other adventurous Ephs have enjoyed hours of fun pondering the contents of the rushing torrent and eventually, throwing caution to the wind, drinking the flume water.

The flume can also repel people. Jon Schuman '93 said, "Sometimes the flume makes me go to other dining halls."

Alison Schapker '93 said, "Last year, as a prospective, I dropped my dishes on the flume and they broke all over." Schapker is now wary of the dangers of fluming.

The flume can also breed hatred among students. Flume technician Tom La Porte '92 confessed, "I really don't like people who don't understand the flume."

Flume etiquette has become an especially sore point among Ephs this Fall. Many upperclassmen and the freshmen themselves have complained that an inordinate number of the class of '93 are clueless as to the correct methods for fluming.

"flume seminar."

The Williams Record, in the interest of fluming efficiency and safety, offers this public service: a simple guide to fluming. In six steps one can flume the average tray consisting of a plate, two glasses, silverware, a bowl and various paper products.

1) Stop at garbage cans, throw away paper products. No food here except bones and pits.

2) Step up to flume area, empty glasses in flume, place each on individual cart spike. KEEP MOVING.

3) Empty bowl's contents in flume (use knock bar when needed), place bowl on next available cart. KEEP MOVING.

fluming guide created with help of Tom La Porte.

"The beast," as students affectionally call the Baxter Hall flume, roars into action after yet another tomato sauce-covered entrée. (Marcus)

The main problem seems to be an epidemic of "flumous stagnatious." This sort of viral infection causes the average flumer to stop moving down the flume as he or she is placing dishes on the carts. The result is a backed up flume line and angry flumers.

Other trouble spots are overfilled racks on the moving carts and the point of merger between the north and south dining hall lines.

Scott Schwager '91 noted, "People just don't know how to merge like they used to."

7 students plead not guilty

by Greg Hart

In a preliminary hearing last Wednesday, the seven Williams students charged with the misdemeanor crime of possession of a class D substance, marijuana, all pled innocent.

The case will be continued until October 18, when the seven seniors — Tim Moore, Joshua Glenn, Christopher Blackburn, Paul Faraci, Daniel Foote Jr., Christopher Page and Seth Kaplinsky — will decide whether to admit to the charge against them or to stand trial.

All seven students are represented by attorney Bruce Grinnell. If the students are proven guilty of possession of a small amount of marijuana and they are first time offenders, the maximum sentence they would face would be six months' probation, according to Grinnell. At the end of the probation period, the case would be closed and the students' records would be sealed.

On the separate felony charges of breaking and entering, possession of stolen property and wanton destruction of property which were filed against him, Moore also pled innocent. This case will also be continued until the court conference on October 18, at which Moore must either admit to the charges or stand trial. Moore is being represented in court by Bruce Grinnell, who has represented the college in some past legal matters, including the lawsuit filed against it by Williams Bookstore owner Joseph Dewey. Grinnell would not elaborate on either of the two cases.

"You can't comment on any part of the case [against Tim Moore] when charges are still pending against him," Grinnell said.

Students who have violated both college regulations and public laws can ask that disciplinary proceedings by Williams be delayed until after the end of the civil case. According to an all-campus mailing sent by Dean of the College Stephen Fix yesterday, "The students accused of misdemeanors for possession... have waived that right, and disciplinary action has been taken against them." No college official would comment on what that action would be.

Moore, however, has asked that any college action against him be held off while his case proceeds, according to the mailing.

Please stand by: Jesup rewiring leads to student delays

by Keith Heddland

Students walking into the Computer Center this year have been faced with a few new problems, including new high density disks which can be eaten by some Macintosh disk drives, a lack of available IBM computers, and confusion over new methods of printing.

But more IBM's are available as of last week, and Jesup Hall officials say that students, as soon as they become informed about the new Computer Center procedures, will have more options than ever, including tapping into a computer network linking the entire science quad.

A major problem has arisen with Apple's use of a DHD, Floppy Drive High Density, in each of its new Macintosh SE computers. These new disk drives enable students with the computers to use new high density disks. But because the Computer Center contains computers with both high and low density drives, students need to be especially careful. They can use low density disks on both the old and new drives, but if they use high density disks on the low density drives, the data on the disks could be destroyed.

computers open to students last year has been open these first few weeks of classes. "I went to the Computer Center and I couldn't figure out which IBM's I could use," said one junior, who asked not to be identified. "The consultants didn't know, and they couldn't even find any of the printing manuals [the new guidebook, Printing at Jesup]."

Director of Academic Computing and Communications Dennis Aebersold said, "The problem is that we moved everything around in the Computer Center." He said the contractor who was doing the networking for the center this summer expected to start wiring the IBM's two weeks before school started, but some of his wiring materials arrived late, and he couldn't terminate the old wires until the day before classes started.

Thus, the hookup of the IBM's has run about two weeks late. But now, there are as many available IBM's as there were when classes ended in May, and a full room of new IBM's will soon be available on the first floor.

The contractors have been working steadily on a new networking program for the entire science quad since the beginning of July, Aebersold said. The program will link all the computers in the science quad as if they were connected correct versions, supported by the Computer Center.

If students follow these procedures, they will be able to print on any of the printers in the Computer Center linked to their computers. This should help combat the long lines for use of the printers which have aggravated students in the past, Aebersold said. One un-networked Laserwriter printing station, however, complete with long lines, will remain open on the first floor.

Other changes in Jesup this year include various new computers, a 24-hour study area, and upgraded software.

Marcus combats poli sci tedium with new technology

by Adam Cherenisky

"I can't remember the last time I used a textbook." This time, however, these are not the words of an apathetic student. They come from Political Science Professor George F. Marcus, who demands that his students gain an understanding of today's world.

"Political Science is a challenge of confronting uncertainties and exploring new ideas and new territory," Marcus said. "We're challenging our convictions of value and belief and seeing if we can come up with something better," he added.

His students in Political Science 206 (Empirical Political Science) and Political Science 211 (Public Opinion and Political Behavior) are expected to meet this challenge head on. Marcus said,

"When students sign up for one of my courses, I am assuming that they have an authentic interest in being challenged." In Political Science 211, the challenge is taking the form of a state-wide poll to be conducted by his students in November. "For the first time we'll be able to conduct our own survey about what the students are interested in," Marcus said. "The poll makes Political Science 211 more student-centered and more active than a conventional course. In this course I am teaching not the conveying of information, but the ability to learn on your own. You can apply that wherever you want, whenever you want."

He said that the course is also important because of the proliferation of polls in today's society. "Everybody's using them—government, newspapers, interest groups. If students can see the strengths and weaknesses of polls they might find practical consequences," he said.

Josh Becker '91, who is in Political Science 211 and interned for him this past summer, said, "Marcus' teaching is a blend of competence and enthusiasm. This stems from the fact that not only is he knowledgeable in the field, but he is on the cusp of it."

Transformation from tedium Marcus has also transformed Political Science 206, a course which many political science majors once cited as their worst nightmare, into a far less tedious learning experience. This has been accomplished with the use of personal computers to compile and analyze data.

"In the old days, empirical data had space. "There are two classes being held here already," Dualeh said. The classrooms will also be used for Winter Study classes and receptions such as the function that will be held for visiting Soviet students on Friday.

Dualeh's vision of the center's future role on campus is broad. "I think eventually what I would like to do is be a resource, be a central place for organizations to plan and coordinate activities, not just the four student organizations (that are going around fundraising. This is an office they can come to either ask for funds or to coordinate with other programs," Dualeh said.

"I think I would eventually like to see Williams College and the Williams community not just get used to the idea of the multicultural center but really see it as an important resource that administrators can use when they are planning multicultural activities and that students can use not just for seeing media or hearing a lecture on a particular theme that maybe the student organizations have sponsored."

According to Dualeh, cross-cultural awareness is more important than ever because of changing demographics, primarily an increase of minority popula-

"Therefore, it's a center for the student body to educate the student body. It's an educational as well as a social resource. So I really want to work with the entire community," she added.

ful addition to the college. "I'm going to spend my first semester talking about the center and going out and walking about the campus a lot, going to the various houses and telling them about what we're doing. I think there are a lot of competing visions of what the center is about, and I need to hear that," she said. "I'm going to go to the College Council, the various student organizations, and the houses and talk to the students and speak with the faculty members. I think there are a lot of faculty members who have ideas and projects that maybe they don't have the time to do, or projects that students want to undertake."

Dualeh also said she is concerned that students see the center as something that will benefit all. "I think what we need to do is strike a balance so that the campus as a whole sees what's happening as for the benefit of the entire community and not just the appeasement of a minority. That, I think, is a tension that is going on. That's what I'm hearing from various people and this is what they perceive to be going on. I've yet to see it because I've only been here two weeks," she said.

There will be an open house at the Multicultural Center next Tuesday at 4 p.m., said Dualeh.

World's largest cocaine bust nets 20 tons

Acting on a tip, federal narcotics agents broke a $6 padlock on a Los Angeles warehouse and discovered 20 tons of cocaine, worth at least $2 billion. Hailed as the largest drug bust in history, agents said that the seizure will have an immediate impact on cocaine supplies in the United States. It also seems to indicate that Colombian drug lords are combining their distribution networks to combat increased vigilance on the part of U.S. and Colombian drug authorities. Six people have been arrested as part of the bust, which occurred in an upscale business neighborhood in L.A.

House Democrats pass capital gains tax cut

The U.S. House of Representatives surprised many observers by approving a cut in the capital gains tax. This will trim the maximum tax on profits from the sale of a variety of assets, including stocks, bonds and real estate, from 28 to 19.6 percent. While many House Democrats had decried the administration-supported measure as being a benefit to the rich, it was the defeat of the bill possible. Some economists have said that any possible increase in investment from money saved will be offset by the loss in revenue for the federal government.

Progress in arms control

The Soviet Union and the United States traded offers in the arenas of space-based weapons and chemical arms last week. President George Bush, speaking at the United Nations in New York on Monday, proposed the elimination of all chemical weapons in 10 years, with an 80 percent cut immediately as long as the Soviet Union agrees to similar measures. The offer was backed up with interest by the Soviets, and foreign minister Edward Shevardnadze proposed an even quicker agenda for cutting the weapons. He also announced that the Soviets would, for the first time, consider separating discussions about space-based weapons, especially those involved in the Strategic Defense Initiative, from talks on long-range, ballistic missiles, the main part of each superpower's arsenal. Both countries also announced that a summit would be held next spring or summer in the U.S. between Bush and Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev.

Former Philippine dictator dies

Ferdinand Marcos, former Philippine president and de facto dictator, died last week in his Hawaiian exile at the age of 72. Marcos had ruled the island nation for 20 years before being driven from the country in the 1985 "People Power" revolution. President Corason Aquino, citing the potential for violence between pro- and anti-Marcos forces during a funeral, has announced that she will not allow his body back into the Philippines for burial, a position that has caused much debate in the country. Marcos was under indictment in the U.S. for real estate fraud; his widow, Imelda, will now have to face those charges alone.

people gathered around it.

The administration has not yet had an opportunity to demonstrate how seriously it intends to follow the policy. Darrow said, "We don't know exactly how the policy will be implemented, because we've never had to invoke it." In this first year of the policy's existence, no entry has yet been fined for violations.

Jay Venkatesan '93 sees the policy as having another effect. "The keg policy has merely moved parties into upper-class houses." Indeed, many students cited an increase in popularity of the co-sponsoring of parties between upper-class houses and freshmen entries.

This arrangement, usually one in which the houses provide space and party-goers while freshmen set up, clean up and provide the alcohol, has met with mixed reactions.

"The overall effect on the upperclass houses has probably been good. Basically, it allows the upperclass students to drink free beer. The upperclass houses are certainly fair to the freshmen entries; they don't cheat them," Cole said.

Other students expressed dissatisfaction with the new system because freshmen are denied their own parties. Frost said, "Having parties at upperclass houses really detracts from the freshman experience. It widens the emphasis of freshman bonding to include upperclassmen."

Unequal exchange

Darrow criticized the way upperclassmen benefit from the system while freshmen provide the alcohol and clean up. "I think that the freshmen are being cheated. They ought to get a new and more fair deal."

Assistant Dean of the College Andrew Hernandez said, "The regulations say that at least half of the students present must be upperclassmen. If not, the hosts are guilty of a regulation violation and can be fined." He cited a recent case in which Spencer House turned down a freshman entry's party request on grounds that it could not guarantee sufficient upperclass attendance.

Another effect of the policy noted by several students is an increased emphasis on hard alcohol at parties. Reasons cited for this change include the fact that hard alcohol can be hidden more easily and is more intoxicating.

"Freshman dorms now have more hard liquor than keg parties," Venkatesan said. "Those who like hard liquor aren't affected [by the new policies]." Galbraith added.

Other students, however, said that keg parties have decreased markedly while the amount of hard alcohol had simply remained constant.

One problem with monitoring the effect of the new policy, raised by both Darrow and Hernandez, is that since drinking is a semi-legal activity, they had received little indication as to how and in what ways drinking was changing.

Students also raised the question of where Williams will go next. "Williams is generally very lenient in terms of alcohol use. I don't think this current trend [in enforcement] will continue," Murin said. Other students echo this view, commenting that Williams' policy and enforcement is lax compared to other campuses they have seen.

"No Exit" tense, exciting experience for audience

by Jodi Ariall

An intense existential experience awaited Williams students who traveled Currier Ballroom last week. On Thursday and Saturday nights at 8:00 and Sunday afternoon at 2:00, Cap and Bells presented Jean-Paul Sartre's one-act play "No Exit" to full-house crowds.

"No Exit" is a 90-minute play that contains enough tension and excitement for a much longer show. The "action" is contained almost entirely within the dialogue between the three main characters. Garcin, Inez, and Estelle are three damned souls that are consigned to everlasting torment in Hell for the sins committed during their lifetimes.

Also making an appearance is a patient valet who conducts the three to the room in which they are to spend eternity together. Tony Miller '92, who played the valet, said, "I've never played such a demonic character. Underneath all the layers of servitude, there is a core of pure evil."

Garcin, a man who operated a pacifist newspaper in Rio until the war broke out and heran for the border, was played by Chuck Pecor '92. Estelle, an upper-crust lady damned for killing her illegitimate child, was played by Abigail Solomon '92. Inez, a middle-class postal worker, lesbian, and self-proclaimed "damned bitch," was played by Christy Leach '92.

Each character was chosen by some diabolical "they" to be a torment to the other two. Even the furniture of the room was specifically disturbing to them. Garcin seemed to be almost obsessed with a bronze urn on the mantelpiece that he could neither move nor get away from, since the door was locked and there were no windows. Estelle's delicate sensibilities were offended by the angles and hideous colors of the furniture, while Inez was most effected by the cerebral tension in the atmosphere of the room.

Tension and oppression

This tension was the most gripping aspect of the play, beginning with the haunting sounds of a harpsichord heard in a musical introduction that set the stage for what followed. Almost immediately after Garcin's entrance with the valet, the very air in the room seemed more oppressive than usual. Sunday afternoon, the bright sunshine was forgotten as every eye in the audience remained fixed on the actors.

The theater-in-the-round setting helped to center the action and even to draw the audience into it, as if we were extra demons sitting on all sides, watching the tortures these humans would inflict on each other. Even after it was over, the spell was slow to break until the actors stood up to a smattering, and then thunders, of applause.

Pecor, Leach, Solomon, and Miller well deserved the accolade that they received. Aside from the difficulty, inherent in theater-in-the-round, of not being able to face all parts of the audience at the same time, and the consequential blurring of some lines, their acting was superb.

A constant state of tension is difficult to maintain for even short stretches. Nevertheless, because most scenes of conversation were between two of the characters with the third looking on, they successfully held it at a fevered pitch for the full performance.

Technical Director Liz Greenman '91 said that "No Exit" is a good introduction to Sartre. "It makes his philosophy clearly apparent," she said.

Mike Reisman '90, the director, said he sees the play in its historical context of the Second World War and the French Underground that was then in operation. He said the main message Sartre is trying to impart is "You are what you do."

And there's no way out of it."

Among the students who attended "No Exit," David Thomas '93 said, "It was good. I definitely believed it." Penny Stancu '93 said, "It's not the sort of thing you want to go see on Sunday afternoon if you want to get some sleep."

Claude Thomas attempts, through music, to save Mohawk, speak to social issues

by Robert Welsberg and Stephanie Jones

The problems experienced by Images recently have their counterpart in North Adams: Mohawk. Due to its run-down condition, the old theater is in danger of closing because of a lack of attendance. In an attempt to keep the Mohawk open until raising enough money to renovate it, the Campaign to Save the Mohawk has been sponsoring a series of live performances at the theater. One of these, the Claude Thomas Group, performed at the Mohawk Saturday. Claude Thomas is a singer, songwriter, and guitarist. He is also a Vietnam veteran who attempts to speak to social issues through his music. Last year he changed the name of his band Freefire to the Claude Thomas Group and, with a new group of supporting musicians, released his debut album, Guns Over America.

"I really feel that what I have to say is worthwhile and the way I express it is exciting," Thomas said. "I've been playing music all my life. For me music is an expression of my soul. I've been professional since I was 13. I started as a drummer in a rock-and-roll band. I started playing guitar in Vietnam. I've traveled all over the world. My first real band was about 1984."

According to Thomas, he is excited about performing in North Adams. "I'm absolutely committed to helping people in terms of hanging on to our past... I believe that America's too much of a throw-away culture."

Thomas also mentioned recent events in the town as an attraction. "I see a move to enhance the cultural opportunities in that area, and I'm excited to be a part of that... From what I've understood the attempt to save the theater by bringing in artists is generating new ideas and growth by bringing in different types of people from outside the area."

Thomas went on to discuss the issues he attempts to address with his music. "One of the biggest issues that I see is one of social complacency. For whatever reason I see people increasingly unwilling to take a position on any particular issue." He commented events in the 80s to those in the 50s, and Senator Joseph McCarthy to people like David Duke.

Skewed priorities

"I don't see a unified stance. What I see is the Supreme Court making decisions that affect basic human rights. I see a President more concerned with getting an amendment against flag-burning than helping the homeless. The priorities seem skewed to me."

He said that he hoped to work against this trend through his music. "I'd like people to see the message as one of hope and one of activism. I don't believe that there is enough of either in society. My experience is that most people experience an attitude of hopelessness; that they just want to gather more toys."

"I see pessimistic music as a problem. I understand saying that the situation is messed up, but give me some alternative. What can we do? Times and circumstances are changing. Things will never be the way they were."

Thomas served as the crew chief on a helicopter gunship in Vietnam in 1966 and 1967, experiencing daily combat.

"I think that my Vietnam experience has had a tremendous impact on my growth as a human being," Thomas said. "Initially my response was negative and pessimistic, that I had been victimized. I adopted a self-protective attitude. I didn't see the gifts I had been given. I got a tremendous appreciation for how fragile, how important life is."

Thomas said that when he first came back from Vietnam the meaning of "living life to the fullest" got distorted. "I thought it meant getting as high as you can get or as drunk as you can get." He said that to him this attitude means living up to his responsibilities. "I have a responsibility to address inadequacies, to talk about those things I see as positive."

He went on to describe what he felt this means in today's world. "No more Vietnam! As a society we must not ignore the reality of military intervention. Drug abuse - don't throw more guns at the problem. Take off the 15 top drug lords, and 15 more will take their place. We must help those countries build up their economies; we can't undermine the price we pay for coffee."

"I'm very involved with people in academic institutions," Thomas said. According to him this is an area in which the decline in human rights has been particularly bad. "We're forcing people into positions they don't agree with. People are not given any choice. Many students are beginning to surface as they did in the mid 60s, with people in authority telling them what to do."

"I love America"

"But I want to say that I love America, and not just in a flag-waving sense. Many people take life too much for granted. People have an innate sense of what's wrong and missing in life. I learned how precious life really is. There's more to life than just driving a [Ferrari] Testarossa. War is fought not by the people who decide to fight it. I think of Vietnam as the Children's Crusade of the 20th century."

Thomas said he wants to travel more and attempt to reach as many people as possible. "I don't just want to perform in Boston. I don't want to be just a big fish in a little pond," Thomas said. He mentioned a major distribution deal as a possible future goal.

Thomas said that the response to his album has been positive. "I'm really excited by it. I've been really flattered by some of the reviews, they've been that good... People listen and then come and see the show and like it even more."

Suderburg forms new group, concert series to create interest in 20th century music

by Beth Neely

Amid the multitude of fall festivals in the Berkshires, the Williams College Museum of Art and the Department of Music have teamed up to kick off something new: a mini festival featuring the Group for 20th Century Music. This group is the brainchild of Professor of Music Robert Suderburg, chairman of the music department.

Suderburg has formed and performed in new music groups since his student days, and he said this group has been a part of his vision for music at Williams for a long time.

"Part of my planning in coming here was that, as things matured, I would try to put together the resources we have around here, which are considerable."

The recently formed group will present their premiere concert at 8:00 p.m. on October 6 and 7 in the 1935 Gallery of WCMA. The concert is the first of three in a series. Suderburg said that giving concerts of contemporary music has always been a strong tradition at Williams, but twentieth century performances needed to be made more regular and involve both music faculty and adjunct professionals. The opening program of this week's concert will consist of "Toccata" for soprano, flute, cello, and piano by Henry Cowell, "Density 21.5" by Edgar Varese, Assistant Professor of Music David Kechley's Sonata for Viola and Piano, and Arnold Schoenberg's mas-

Seasoned pieces The Cowell and the Schoenberg are seasoned pieces for the Suderburgs, works which they have performed frequently on the West Coast and in the Composers' Forum, the contemporary music group Suderburg founded in Philadelphia.

Suderburg said his hope is that the music will reach and nourish the public and that the pooled resources of musicians at Williams and beyond will create high quality performances of 20th century music. "The concerts will give the [musicians] an opportunity to get together and really prepare performances of the pieces that are not readings." In addition to performing older works of our century, Suderburg plans to involve student works, alumni works, and perhaps a commission.

According to Suderburg, forming a new music group in the Eighties is not an easy matter. "It's almost against the grain, because this was done in the Sixties and Seventies and it has all been closed down in the Eighties." But concerts like these have been Suderburg's focus.

"This has been my thing," he said. "It's what I've been doing ever since I was a student." Suderburg formed contemporary music groups with Philadelphia Orchestra members in Philadelphia and founded a series at the North Carolina School of the Arts and the University of Washington.

Perhaps a more overt difficulty in creating groups such as this one is in finding ways to overcome the public's fear of contemporary music. The names of "The Contemprible Group", one of Suderburg's former groups, and "Friends and Foes of Contemporary Music", a New York group, exhibit an awareness of this challenge.

Audience turn-off

Suderburg said he has ideas on how to make contemporary music more palatable to the public. "Primarily it comes down to the choice of repertoire and the way it's performed. You could take five different pieces and put them together, and because of their various nature - say they're all aggressive, serial, dissonant, destructive gestures - obviously out of self-preservation the audience is going to turn off."

"It's like having someone give you a sermon on hell and damnation over and over and over again. You can't expect the audience to give themselves to you by banging them in the face."

If looked at as a whole, however, the twentieth century provides an enormous range of possibilities in programming, Suderburg said. He has arranged an intriguing combination of works for this weekend's concerts.

Schoenberg's monumental work, "Pierrot lunaire," Opus 21 is the program's focus and fills the second half of the program. Subtitled "Three times seven poems of Albert Giraud," these twenty-one poems are set for Sprechstimme (a kind of "speech-song"), piano, flute (piccolo), clarinet (bass clarinet), violin, viola, and violoncello.

"The Schoenberg was a lot of variety in gesture and rhythm all the way through. Where there are really deep psychologically negative moments, there are also wonderful whiffs of the past and reminiscences of the Viennese waltz. Schoenberg's hypersensitivity and liberal use of the riot gives the music the character of a clown with a broken mask," Suderburg said.

He described the opening of the piece by Cowell (1887-1965), an American composer, as almost non-Western in character. "It has recognizable little folk shapes and things like that."

The following selection by the French-American composer Varese (1883-1965) is totally different. "The flute's there sitting alone with this kind of ritual repetition of short, little cells. It's very much like Asian music. You simply have a kind of narcissistic solitude improvisation," he said.

Closing the first half will be the work by Kechley. According to Suderburg, his "Sonata for Viola and Piano" is a synthesis of the Expressionist side of contemporary music all the way to the folk-based Bartok side.

The upcoming January concert will feature the Williams Trio in a premiere of a commission of a trio by Benjamin Lees, Elizabeth Suderburg singing works of Rodrigo and Villa Lobos, and Moore playing Schmitke's Cello Sonata. The May concert will feature performance art pieces by Berio, Erickson, and Suderburg, performed by guest trombonist Stuart Dempster, and a potential premiere of a work by Paul Brainard '89, performed by Paul Sundberg and the Berkshire Brass Quintet.

Suderburg said the concerts will benefit WCMA as well. The museum has the advantage of reaching out to an additional audience, and the extended intermission during the concerts will allow people to look at current exhibits. Suderburg said he hopes that future displays will mirror the musical offerings in their style and time periods. German Expressionist and Dada exhibits are possibilities.

"I really think one should deal with one's own time and the art of one's own time, and sometimes it may be somewhat painful. But it's also a sign of life rather than an escape from it," Suderburg said.

Beer book bombs by being boring and bombastic

by Chuck Samuelson

The new Fifth Anniversary Edition of The Complete Book of Beer Drinking Games by Andy Griscom, Ben Rand, and Scott Johnston (Mustang Publishing, $5.95) is an intriguingly complex yet somewhat dimwitted attempt to rectify what has been and what remains a gaping hole in the reference book publishing industry.

I refer, of course, to a systematic analysis and cataloging of the many forms and rituals associated with beer drinking on campus. Given the importance and significance the brown water plays on the campuses of so many great institutions of higher learning throughout this great land, there is a real need for an inventory of the plethora of forms beer drinking can take.

I have been to dinners in Baxter that offered a greater analysis of beer drinking games.

Unfortunately, The Complete Book is to serious beer drinking what Playboy is to hard core pornography - just a glimpse of the truly remarkable lengths to which people will devote themselves in the name of a good time. The book falls to address such pressing questions as "Why do we drink?" "Does Lite Beer taste great or is it, as Mr. Uecker contends, less filling?" and "How many bubbles are there in a can of beer?"

The book does manage the rather pedestrian and unimaginative task of introducing 50 basic games that every freshman has mastered by the beginning of October. It conveniently categorizes different drinking games by their various, subjectively labeled, "boot factors." (As this is a family publication, I will not enlighten those who do not comprehend the significance of these rankings.)

these games (through experience, I suppose). Such Williams favorites as the Century Club (which the authors have dubbed the 100 Beer Club) are assessed an impressive "boot factor" of five and the wimpler games are judged according to their own, often considerable, merits.

While the authors have obviously indulged once or twice themselves, they seem to lack that true understanding that can only come with repeated practice. Their comprehension of the full range of issues involved is muted and somewhat simplistic (perhaps because the authors went to Yale).

It is in the book's failure to show intellectual creativity and fortitude that this otherwise promising work fails miserably. Though the neophyte might well benefit from its elementary instructions and brief history of beer drinking, such trivial tidbits as the mention of the fact that beer was invented by the Sumerians do little to quench the thirst for knowledge the typical beer drinker characteristically displays.

In fact, a truly great work of this type should raise issues that the average 19th can discuss and contemplate over dinner. The sad fact of the matter is that I have been to dinners in Baxter that offered a greater analysis of the strategy and technique of beer drinking games than the authors ever even attempted in this ill-considered study.

Perhaps the depth of their misunderstanding is best understood by way of an anecdote. One night I was standing on line for a beer at a party in Mission Park. (I think it was Mission Park, there were lots of freshmen and warm beer.) Anyway, I was just standing there, minding my own business and only pushing people out of the way who were smaller than I was, when I saw a certain friend of mine who I knew to have a deep concern for issues surrounding the moral and philosophical basis of beer drinking.

We got to talking and when, a half hour later, we each had our beer, he challenged me to a chug. Only this chug was different, for this student told me to make very sure that I didn't spill any beer on my shirt. "After all," he said, "everybody knows the real object of beer drinking games is not to spill your beer."

OCC prepares for winter job crush

by Mary Maule

Although summer vacation is still eight months away, the Office of Career Counseling is already busy with programs and information sessions for students interested in getting a head start. Both seniors and undergraduates alike are coming in to get information on opportunities and the staff at OCC is providing programs and workshops to meet the demand, according to director Fatma Kassamali.

As weekly issues of The Lephlet show, OCC has planned resume and interviewing workshops as well as panels designed to disseminate information on general topics and fields.

OCC runs several programs like the "Make a Difference: Help Others" panel, which brings in alumni and others to talk about their experiences and tell of similar opportunities in social service careers which don't usually recruit here, according to Kassamali. Other programs discuss possibilities in theater, law and investment banking.

The many corporations and schools that will come recruiting throughout the year have started to appear as well. Although the actual recruiting and interviewing won't take place for several months, many places send representatives to give pre-recruitment information sessions.

Information about grants and fellowships is also available now, as some of the deadlines are coming up soon. "Some internships have deadlines this semester as well," Kassamali said. "The information sessions for these take place now."

The counselors at OCC advise seniors especially to come in to the center now. Senior counselors Kassamali and Mary Lamb can advise students on post-graduation opportunities and help a student determine in what he or she is interested.

"Too many people are afraid to come in because they say, 'I don't know what I want to do next year, therefore I can't go to OCC,'" Kassamali said. "Helping students decide what they want to do is part of what we're here for."

Coming in now gives seniors the chance to do some research, narrow down the possibilities, and find general information. "They can also make contacts with alumni to get first-hand information,"

Kassamali said.

"Once they have gotten an overview of a particular field, then students will learn how to market their skills and conduct interviews," she said. The OCC counselors can give individual advice on updating resumes and conduct mock interviews.

Kassamali stressed the diversity of resources to be found at the OCC library. "There seems to be some myths about OCC catering only to business," she said. "Our new motto is 'It's more than what you think.'" Besides the social services and not-for-profit organizations, the counselors and materials at OCC can provide information on communications, public relations, teaching, and international activities, to name a few, according to Kassamali.

"There's a wealth of resources in every area you can think of," she said. "And if we don't have enough information on a particular field, we'll go out of our way to get it." She said that some people have an image of the center that isn't true and that she wished they could give constructive comments. "If they feel that there is not enough information, they should give us input so that we can try to change that."

Kassamali also urged campus organizations such as minority groups or those concerned with environmental affairs to work with the OCC to provide information and programs in areas of concern to them.

Another popular misconception about OCC concerns who should use it. "A lot of seniors use the service, but it's a good resource for summer jobs, too," Kassamali said. "I hope that undergraduates will use it."

There are two staff members, Lisa M. Olcese and Kathy McKevey, who are specifically undergrad counselors. They work both with students who are starting to get information for post-graduate careers, as well as those interested in summer jobs.

As always, students can walk in to use the resources to find general information in different fields as well as information on specific jobs and internships available. The counselors are also willing to help students find this information and to discuss a student's particular situation, according to Olcese.

True, they may not be sentencing anyone to death, but the new college council administration were plenty serious at the first meeting of the year. Last week, the council voted to cut somewhat the Student Activities Council budget for 1989-90. Seated left to right are vice president Carol Metcalfe '90, president Sanand Raghunandanan '90 and treasurer Jan Gray '90. (Welch)

Vandals strike over summer, but security sees no greater trend in damage to school

by Tam Dupree

Several high-profile incidents of vandalism in recent months have led the Williams community to question the safety of both personal and college property.

Although incidents such as last year's firebombing of the Mission Park parking lot, this summer's spray painting of Chandler Gym, and last week's Faculty House break-in are presumably unrelated, taken together they might suggest a rising trend of vandalism at Williams.

Williams Director of Security Ramon Jenkins denies this notion. "From time to time things happen, but there has been no increase," he said. "It's been business as usual."

However, the Housing budget, which takes into account the amount of physical damage and vandalism to residential houses, has risen from $23,000 to $35,000 in the past five years.

Director of Housing Thomas McEvoy cited the rising costs of labor and materials as reasons for the budget increase. However, he added, "It seems the damage is increasing."

According to Buildings and Grounds Director Norman Quinn the vandals have favorite campus targets.

"There's a 'No Parking' sign by Mission Park which is constantly getting torn out from the ground," he said. "We put it in at night and it's gone by morning. Once we found it in Eph's Pond."

Another trouble spot is the row of trees near Parsons and Hubbell houses. Last fall, according to Quinn, vandals snapped off six to eight newly-planted saplings. The trees were replaced this year and were destroyed once again.

Chandler Pool is another favorite target. People have repeatedly forced their way in, hoping for a late-night swim. In one instance, nocturnal revelers entered the gym by climbing through an unlocked coach's window and crawling through the ceiling ducts until they reached the pool.

Quinn said that he feels that the majority of break-ins at Chandler are merely kids looking for a good time. Nevertheless, concern for the College's liability has led to the installation of a motion detector, he said.

McEvoy and Quinn both believe that Williams students are responsible for most of the vandalism on campus.

Alcoholic abandon?

McEvoy was quick to cite a definite correlation between alcohol and property damage. "Far more incidents of property damage occur on weekends and during parties where alcohol is served," he said. "We'd like to create an awareness in students that their actions have an effect. I don't think a lot of students really think about it, but [their behavior] makes a statement about the community they live in," McEvoy said.

Quinn said he believes that outsiders are responsible for many of the "high-profile" incidents.

"What's happening now is more out in the open," Quinn said, referring to recent incidents which have received local press coverage. "The media finds it exciting. It makes all the papers."

Despite increased public awareness that vandalism exists at Williams, Quinn contends that many students are not suspicious enough.

"(Outsiders) know that colleges are easy targets," he said. "You can just walk right into dorm. I don't look like a student, yet in all my years here, I've never been questioned once, going in and out of students' rooms."

said that the college's plan to control runoff was sound, but needed to be implemented faster.

All of this was going on while a house just adjacent to the property was in danger of sliding down the mountain; water had eroded its foundation to such a degree that the family was forced to move to a motel at college expense.

A local resident also accused the college of causing cracks in the walls of his house because of the construction. But the college has steadfastly maintained that its work on Pine Cobble could not be the cause of the cracks.

Finally, the college raised some eyebrows by removing more trees than it had thought would be necessary. Janairo had said that step was needed to make more room for the right-of-way on the hillside, without it, the road could not be supported by the slope.

Williams was also taken to task for the hairy honeysuckle bushes growing at the Pine Cobble site. It has since had Professor of Biology Henry Art study the plant, rare in this part of the state, to see its ability to grow in other environments (see related story). The college agreed last year to curtail the number of units it would try to build on the mountain. Dethier is worried about the sediment sliding off the mountain, even with the college's measures to protect the nearby wetlands.

"What concerns me is the amount of sediment running off the site every time it rains. It's scary and discouraging. I'm not sure where it's all going and who's watching it. A lot of it's getting into the Housatonic River. I'm hoping the college will be able to stabilize the soil by grading. They'll have to plant this week so it's ready for late fall rains and snowmelt," Dethier said.

The sediment, which is made up mostly of glacial clays, has posed the largest problem for the college. The Williamsstown Conservation Commission has been monitoring the steps the college is taking to reduce the amount of sedimentation. The commission has tried to help guide the college in balancing the need for quick and immediate slope stabilization with preferable, long-term solutions.

"The interest of the commission is the stabilization of the slopes, and we'd like to do that through vegetation, especially seeded loam [a thick type of soil]," Chairman Harold Brozman said. "The only thing that's disappointing [about the college's approach] is the speed. We're approaching the end of the season, and we'd like to see the soil protected soon. The college is in tune to that."

The college had originally said it would use small rocks and the replanting of vegetation -- the large amount of clearing on the hillside meant little water would be reabsorbed into the soil -- to control runoff from the mountain.

These issues were addressed at a meeting of the commission last Wednesday. A motion was adopted requiring the college to loam and hydrosed (a type of seeding process) the remaining exposed soil. Although some members of the commission wanted no wood chips on the slope, Brozman's view prevailed.

"As long as the situation can be controlled, the commission should be happy. That was our primary concern. I think we've reached an agreement about slope stabilization."

In addition to concerns about siltation, the slide has heightened uncertainty about the project's financing.

"$7 million has been approved by the trustees," Janairo said. "It remains to be seen if it will be on budget. It will be a matter of if the fix proposed by the hydro-geologist is enough or if we have to do more."

ment." Art said that the agreement has enhanced the college's ability to increase its research capabilities. "It allowed the college to go ahead with the project and was effective in [furthering] research. It's undoubtedly something that will continue for the next several years."

"In a way, we're on the cutting edge of research... Very little is known about this plant. [Could the] species on the edges of their ranges be acting differently than in the center? Why doesn't the species move east? Are there more patches? There's some intriguing intellectual questions, making a very interesting applied environmental issue."

Next summer, Art says, more research on the honeysuckle is planned as is a newspaper campaign to find any additional patches of the plant.

Between his research projects and teaching, Art finds time for many activities within Williamsstown. He is a deacon for the First Congregational Church and coaches soccer for the Williamsstown Youth Center. He describes life in Williamsstown as "idyllic... [it's] a great place to raise a family." He is married and has three sons, one in sixth grade, one attending Williams as a freshman and the third attending Kenyon College in Ohio as a junior.

His enthusiasm for the surrounding town surely extends from his enthusiasm for the college itself. Art has found that the role of science in a liberal education is growing year after year. He feels that science and the humanities are inextricably linked to a good liberal curriculum. "I feel very strongly that the mental flexibility gained through having that educational experience is ideal."

lot of tedious labor attached to it," Marcus said. "Now that we use personal computers rather than VACs, we don't have to do quite as much of the physical business [as before]," he said.

Additionally, the time saved by the personal computers is enormous. "The time to go from idea to analysis to interpretation or seconds rather than weeks," Marcus said.

In addition to his teaching, Marcus is involved in several research projects. He said that one of these deals with "the role of emotions in presidential campaigns: what kinds of emotions the presidential candidates elicit and what comes as a result of that." Another project on which he is working jointly with a professor from the University of Minnesota involves what kind of information makes people either more tolerant or less tolerant. Both of these projects reflect Marcus' strong interest in the world of feeling or sentiment and how it influences opinion and behavior. The data for these projects come from public opinion polls and experimental design. "The projects complement each other quite well," Marcus said.

Marcus grew up in Boston. He went to Columbia University as an undergraduate and received his Ph.D. from Northwestern University in 1967. He has been a professor at Williams since the fall of 1967.

Williams prepares itself for coming critical shortage of faculty in 1990s

played a role in faculty recruiting.

"Professors in the sciences want more time for research and a smaller course load. The college is not always willing to meet the counter-offers candidates have received from other institutions," Reichert said. He added that science professors also tend to demand start-up costs for labs and research.

Although Williams has been increasing the salaries for all its faculty, including starting salaries, it cannot always compete with the larger universities in the sciences.

The Bowen report has found several reasons for the shortages in faculty. The New York Times, citing the report, stated that between 1971 and 1985, "the percentage of graduate and undergraduate degrees conferred in the arts and sciences fell to 25 percent from 40 percent." At this rate, the report predicted the ratio of available candidates to available teaching positions would drop to 0.80 in the sciences and 0.70 in the humanities. The picture in the humanities and social sciences is definitely not encouraging in the future, according to Bowen.

Bleaker outlook in humanities
One reason for the especially drastic problem in the humanities is that a doctorate in the social sciences requires approximately 12 years of study, while it takes about 7 years to earn such a degree in the sciences. This has led many graduates to pursue fields such as business and engineering, Reichert agrees that in recent years colleges and universities have lost potential faculty in fields such as economics and some sciences, to industry and government agencies.

Another factor which colleges and universities will have to consider in preparing for the future is a decrease in the number of black males receiving doctorates. In comparison, the number of black female doctorate recipients has risen slightly over the same time period.

While the number of minority doctorate recipients has only risen slightly since 1977, the demand for minority professors has greatly increased. "Minority faculty, today, are in great demand,"

540 in 1987. The number of blacks receiving doctorate degrees, however, has shrunk from 1,116 in 1977 to 765 two years ago. This decrease has been caused by a significant drop in the number of black males receiving doctorates. In comparison, the number of black female doctorate recipients has risen slightly over the same time period.

While the number of minority doctorate recipients has only risen slightly since 1977, the demand for minority professors has greatly increased. "Minority faculty, today, are in great demand,"

'The problem is not getting faculty; the problem is getting the best'

This information further indicates that the number of white male doctorate recipients has fallen off steeply since twelve years ago. In 1977, there were 17,011 white men who received doctorates, while only 12,116 were awarded in 1987 to white males. In contrast, the number of white female doctorate recipients grew slightly over the same decade.

The total number of minority doctorate recipients, male and female, also rose slightly between 1977 and 1987. The number of female minorities receiving doctorate degrees has steadily increased, offsetting a decrease in the number of male minority doctorate recipients.

There has been a large increase in Asian doctorates, from 339 in 1977 to Reichert said. Minorities currently constitute approximately 10 percent of the Williams faculty, an increase of about 2 percent since the 1986-87 academic year.

One of the most pressing needs in higher education is preparing for the future shortages. According to the Bowen report, the ideal ratio is 1.3 candidates available for each job. This ratio is attainable only if there were a 64 percent increase in new doctorates. Bowen advocates limiting the required hours of teaching in order to provide additional time for research as an incentive to lure new blood into teaching.

"The shortage is only beginning to make itself felt. There are two reasons for these shortages nationally. One is that there's going to be an unusual number of people retiring. I think there's truth in that. The other has to do with increased enrollments. If you combine these increased enrollments with the unreasonable number of retirements there will be a shortage," Reichert said.

Self-sustaining competition
Reichert's theory is also based on self-sustaining competition. With a greater demand for qualified doctorates, more graduates will be encouraged to teach and the best candidates will be hired. He added that this situation will not be alleviated immediately, but a solution is possible. "I think the only solution is to make the teaching profession more attractive."

"That means better working conditions and higher salaries," said Reichert. In the case of Williams, Reichert, while denying any problems with shortages, said, "We do have to work harder to attract [faculty]."

Unlike other institutions, who have had to close entire departments due to shortages, Williams has escaped without a problem. Reichert stressed the importance of the reputation of the college. "The faculty at Williams is just great," Reichert said.

In fact, the market for available teaching candidates for Williams is large, despite the national shortage.

"There are people out there who would die to teach at Williams. The problem is not getting faculty; the problem is getting the best."

Up next: Trinity

Melendy said that the team will have to continue their recent progress to defeat Trinity and RPI this week. Trinity will be a particular challenge for the Ephs on Saturday, possibly the toughest game the Ephs will play this year, according to the coach. Trinity is 4-1 and has lost only to Bowdoin, the second-ranked team in New England.

"The past few years Trinity has been real weak, but they came on at the end of last season," said Melendy.

RPI may be another challenge for the Ephs. "We had an easy game over RPI last year but they're a much sharper team," said the coach. Last season RPI fielded a team of 13 players, but this season 13 freshmen have bolstered the team's ranks of returning players.

Women ruggers travel to Big Green; A-side ties, B-side wins

by Amanda Gallagher

The WWRFC traveled up to Dartmouth last Saturday to take on the Big Green on their home turf. After 70 minutes of regulation and 10 minutes of overtime, the A-side game ended in a scoreless tie. The B and B' sides, however, came on the field next with a beautiful 8-0 win over the Dartmouth B side.

The A-side match was a long game marked by many mauls and rucks as well as many injuries to the Williams side. Williams lacked fire and desire for the ball in the first half of the game, allowing Dartmouth to win most of the mauls. However, while still held Green scoreless thanks to the many last ditch tackles and great kicks of fullback Katy Carr '91. After half time the A-side finally pulled themselves together and caught on fire. The A-side scrum, working as one, broke Dartmouth's domination of the maul. After many injuries, suits Tim mile Friend '90 and Gillian Flory '92 showed their freshness and reinvigorated the line with some great runs. Carr continued to make very strong kicks and the white scrum controlled most of the line outs. Still despite this valiant effort, the score stood at a 0-0 tie when the final whistle blew.

The game then moved into a 5 minute overtime and a 5 minute sudden death. Early in overtime a Dartmouth player had a breakthrough run and was heading for the Williams try zone when sub Laura Kalyajian 'EX came from nowhere with an amazing tackle that foiled Dartmouth's attempted try. Jackie Graves '90 also had a beautiful tackle that stopped another attempted breakthrough. Nothing was scored so the game moved into sudden death. Still, neither side was able to score, and the game ended with Williams only 2 yards away from the Dartmouth try line.

B-side downs Green 8-0

In contrast to the A-side, the Killer B's were on fire from the start of the game and they had none of the A-side's trouble with scoring. The game opened with a strong kick from rookie fullback Mary Carney '93 and never stopped moving. Lines Friend and Flory were constantly on top of their opposition demonstrating smart playing and good tackles. Scrum half Andrea Walter '92 was another force and did an excellent job of keeping the pressure on the Dartmouth scrum half.

scrum who pushed a maul over the try line so that prop Sue Pitcher '90 could touch it down for the score. The try went unconverted leaving the tally at Williams 4, Dartmouth 0. This was closely followed by a breakthrough run by Kalyajian who ran past the Dartmouth defenders to touch the ball down the middle of the Green's try zone raising the score to Williams 8, Dartmouth 0.

In the second half B' subbed in and continued to show great desire and playing ability. Scrummie Briar McNutty was always on the ball and rookie Kristen van Horne '93 had some great runs bursting through the Dartmouth defense. The half remained scoreless but the B' ruggers showed that they have the stuff that it takes to be great players. Hooker Margaret Wang was a definite hard guy playing through a bloody nose and a wrenched arm. Scrum half Megan Hay played hard and tough relentlessly tackling her opposition. The line worked very well together. In particular, there was a beautiful passing sequence from Flory to Laura Havrilesky '90 to Jenny Lee '93 that was pure pleasure to watch. This weekend, the women ruggers will travel to Boston for the Boston Tournament.

dizzy spell, dropped out fairly early in the race. "I passed [Marc Beitz] at about the mile-and-a-half point walking back. At that point, I was thinking, 'Whatever you feel like, you really can't afford to let down if you're going to be the fifth guy,'" said Brendan Keane '92, referring to the scoring members of the team. Successful performances were indicative of the team's ability to pull together under less than ideal circumstances. Junior Dylan Cooper, recovering from a cold, pulled through to lead the team across the line, finishing seventh in 27:04. Tony Wiener '93, with a tremendous kick to the finish, followed soon after Cooper in ninth place. Brian Conn '93, third for the team, finished his best race yet at Williams in 11th place. Nate McVey-Finney '90 continuing to run well, placed 16th with Keane at his heels in 21st.

Recovered from a foot injury, junior Evan Driscoll ran his first race of the season. "A solid debut," commented Coach Farwell of Driscoll's run. Steve Brody '90, Walter '90, and John Dwyer '92, competed Saturday completing the 10-man Williams squad.

Women's 27-point win In its usual stunning style, the women's team triumphed over the field to win with 27 points.

"It wasn't as big a meet as we had hoped," said Molly Martin '92. Running against the University of Rochester, Brandeis University, Vassar, and NYU didn't provide much of a challenge for the powerful Williams team.

"Both Rochester and Brandeis have very competitive men's teams, but their women just weren't," said Andrea Cady '92.

Martin broke 20 minutes on the 3.1 mile Van Courtland Park course. She crossed the line in 19:54, only four seconds behind the first-place competitor from Vassar. Lindley Hall '93 led the pack of Williams runners behind Martin across the finish line. Hall finished fourth in 20:19, followed closely by Cherle Macaulay '92 in fifth and Andrea Cady '92 in sixth.

"It was fun...we bung together right until the very end," said Cady. Helene Wilburn '93, Williams' fifth woman, secured 10th place for her team. Freshman Jennifer Raney ran close to Wilburn, completing the course in 11th place.

"It was nice to see some new faces," Coach Larry Bell said, despite the disappointment that the competition wasn't what the Eph women had hoped it would be.

Next week both teams will travel to Trinity to race against Trinity, RPI, and North Adams.

Cycling competes at Danbury Criterium, Seaman leads team

by Juan Alonzo

Last weekend, Eph cycling team captain John Seaman '91 again headed the squad to notoriety at the Danbury Criterium in Danbury, Connecticut.

While Seaman competed in a United States Cycling Federation (USCF) category (cat) three race, Larry Skowronek '92 pitted himself against cat four riders. Junior Mary Moule and freshman Chris Sheridan raced in a short citizens' race.

The cat three criterium covered 50 laps around a 1k loop. The course was tough, taking the racers through six 90-degree corners and a moderate hill. The cyclists sped through the first half of the race with no one making any strong moves. In a sprint lap midway through the race, the pack burst for a $100 prize.

Seaman, however, reserved his energies. In the next lap, he and two other riders surged to a 20-second lead.

"I knew people would be tired after the sprint."

After a 17-lap breakaway, four riders bridged the gap between the leaders and the rest of the pack.

"When the four guys moved up on us they brought the pack within striking distance. The pack was all together again for the last five or six laps."

In the final laps, a single rider launched out and gained 15 seconds on the rest of the cyclists. The pack was then essen-ever, was not very strong. We were only averaging 24 mph when we should have been averaging 26 or 27."

"I'm not disappointed. Breakaways and time trials are my forte. Anytime I can get away I feel like I've done a good job."

In the cat four criterium, Skowronek did not fair as well as Seaman. He eventually dropped out of the race.

The citizens' race disappointed Moule and Sheridan because of its brevity. Originally scheduled for 10 laps, the criterium was split into two groups, each racing only five laps.

"It's kind of annoying to drive for two hours and then do a race that's only as long as a cross-country run," Moule commented.

"It was really fast. People were trying to sprint. It was pretty dangerous because people were taking the corners too fast."

In a field of forty riders, Moule and Sheridan finished directly behind each other, Moule placing 14th and Sheridan 15th.

Seaman said. The group I was in, however, was not very strong. We were only averaging 24 mph when we should have been averaging 26 or 27."

The citizens' race disappointed Moule and Sheridan because of its brevity. Originally scheduled for 10 laps, the criterium was split into two groups, each racing only five laps.

"It's kind of annoying to drive for two hours and then do a race that's only as long as a cross-country run," Moule commented.

"It was really fast. People were trying to sprint. It was pretty dangerous because people were taking the corners too fast."

In a field of forty riders, Moule and Sheridan finished directly behind each other, Moule placing 14th and Sheridan 15th.

WRFC A- and B-sides fall to a powerful Dartmouth squad

by Chris Blackburn

The men's rugby club faced a tough match last Saturday, traveling north into the den of Division I powerhouse Dartmouth. They embarked on the Mohawk Trail for the first time this season and showed the Green that the WRFC is alive and well.

In the A-side match, forty minutes of inspired play by the White Dogs was enjoyed by the packed sideline. An obviously superior Dartmouth side was held out of the try zone for the first twenty minutes of play despite constant pressure. Finally, a Green forward charged over the line to make the score 4-0.

Suddenly, the A-side exploded. In a dazzling display, the Williams backs moved swiftly downfield. A long run from fullback by Chap Petersen '90 set up a perfectly placed kick by Phil Jack '90, which was in turn seized by Jack Matt Collins '91 for a try. S.B. Hopkins' conversion kick was good, and the A-side was suddenly up, 6-4. The rest of the half saw Williams continue to pressure, but to no avail.

In the second half, it appeared as though the Big Green had realized that the WRFC had every intention of making a real match of it. Their level of play improved dramatically, as their scrum won nearly every ball in both tight and loose play. Their relentless, charging backs, given the ball over and over by the forwards, had no choice but to score. When the dust cleared from the pitch, the score stood at Dartmouth thirty-one, Williams six.

The B-side walked on the pitch determined to restore the pride of the club, and faced a Dartmouth side that proved to be their equal. In a tightly played match, the Green scrum's slight advantage was nullified by the outstanding play of the Williams line, as Bill Weiss '91, Jamie Slater '91, and Coley "Tercador" Hooley ran and kicked with craft and skill.

At the end of the first half, the score reflected the balanced play, as Dartmouth's early try made it 4-0. The Killer B's came out on fire in the second half, maintaining possession and pressure for nearly five minutes of play before Weiss finally touched down a try. Senior Bruce Young's conversion made it 6-4.

Solid back and forth rugby was played, as Dartmouth scored again on a controversial lineup play to make it 8-6, but was then held off by the heroic Williams backs as the Green pressure became more and more intense. The Killer B's failed to score despite numerous chances, until finally, with one minute to play, a Dartmouth prop seized the ball and bulldozed his way into the try zone, effectively crushing the B-side's hopes. The final score stood at Dartmouth twelve, Williams six.

It was up to the C-side to recover the day, facing a strong side (the Dartmouth club fielded a full five sides on Saturday), the veteran Williams C's showed their worth, beating the green 6-0, for the C-side's second straight shut-out. Williams D. Jamie '93 was responsible for the win, with his two penalty kicks accounting for all the scoring. The Williams scrum dominated play, repeatedly driving over their opponents behind the push of second row Jason Grizzly '92 and Ian Gallagher '92.

The youth corps on D-side, despite good play by Sweet Pete '93 and Chris Bulger '92, were overwhelmed by their more experienced opponents, losing by four tries. In the D's game, however, a rejuvenated Williams side, with veteran speedsters Buff Winterer '91 and Tom Harvey '91 at wings, displayed the true spirit of the WRFC, as veteran players and absolute rookies teamed up to whomp the Green rookies. After the match, rugby tradition was upheld, as Dartmouth hosted the WRFC and received a lesson in rugby spirit. Despite a valiant effort by the Green, Williams won the third half and thus the day. Next week the Roadshow will appear at Hilly Cross, a vital test.

STAR PERFORMANCE PIZZA PARTY

On Thursday, September 21, 1989, a Special Pizza Party was prepared for the following people at the Log. The purpose for this special party was to thank them for the extraordinary commitment and responsibility they displayed over the course of the last year. Because of the efforts of these special people, we in Dining Services had a very successful year and hope for nothing less this year with the return of these Star Performers.

Golfers third at Skidmore

by Augusto Torres

The Williams men's golf team got their clubs out a couple of times last week, competing for stroke at last Wednesday's Skidmore Invitational and then taking on the Taconic Membership in the Schultz Cup Match this past Saturday.

Skidmore, ranked third in the country in Division III, won their own tourney, while the Ephs finished third behind Division I Clarkson with a low combined score of 329. Although the end result was respectable, the squad was hoping for an even better performance.

Team captain Sean Seguin '91, who tallied an 84, said, "I was not hitting my irons very accurately. I should have been four or five strokes lower." Of the team in general he commented, "a couple of guys had never seen the course before. You don't know when to take risks or when to play it safe. We were a little disappointed. Our target for a tournament is usually 320," Seguin later stated. But there were two bright spots for the team. John McCormick '93 was solid with a low of 80, and Jeff Alexander '92 notched the team's best score with a 78. Alexander said, "I felt like I should have played better. [But] I was still happy — I putted well and that made a big difference."

On Saturday, the Ephs took on the best of the Taconic Membership in an event held in honor of former Secretary of State George Schultz. The match, which is expected to become an annual affair, saw the Ephs on the team end of a 24-12 score. Seguin praised his opponents, noting that "we played all right but they were really tough to beat." The team will try to fare better in a home match this Saturday when they take on Springfield and A.I.C.

frustrate the Eph offense for over 89 minutes, but persistence paid off in the end for Williams.

The game had started off slowly, as the two teams combined for only seven shots in the first half. But the heated rivalry between these two squads came to the fore in the second half, and the final 45 minutes were much more emotionally charged and exciting. Captain Dan Calichman '90 said, "We're a better team than they are, but they ran at us and hit us and had us pretty tired up." Games between these two teams are traditionally close and hard fought. "We never have an easy time with North Adams," Coach Russo said, "because they're always well-organized and play very tough defense. They are also a physical team, and that gave us real problems today with the field being so wet."

The Ephs see action in the upcoming week on the road against both the Springfield Indians and the Trinity Bantams. Williams defeated these teams by scores of 6-0 and 5-0 respectively last season, but the team definitely cannot afford to rest on its laurels just yet.

Water polo falls to Jeffs 13-7, goes to Philly

by Clay Wheeler

The Williams water polo team began last week recovering from a brutal roadtrip to Philadelphia, and six days (and seven games) later the weekend found the team recuperating from a 13-7 Friday night loss to rival Amherst.

In a rare example of Eph athletics competing with a Big East team, Williams water polo traveled to the City of Brotherly Love for the weekend Wildcat Invitational. Eph polo finished with a 1-1-2 record after downing Boston University, losing to Y.A.A. (a local club) and coming up even with both Haverburg College and the J.V. squad from Villanova. The tournament was an important opportunity for the team to gain game experience and adjust to the new makeup of the team after the graduation of several key players.

"holemen" put in notable performances against their larger counterpart, Donley. Williams goalie Gavin Webb '93 also had an exceptional game.

"Our outside shot was definitely lacking," Lane said of the Eph offense, and emphasized preparedness for the league tournament of Bowdoin next weekend. In two weeks (Oct. 13-15) the Ephs will be home hosting their own tournament against teams such as Maryland, Amherst, and Boston U.

One bright spot of the Amherst trip was the lack of car problems, which had practically crippled the team to and from Villanova. Mike Lane felt that mechanical failures "were avoided with thanks to a thorough examination of team cars by the resident Eph mechanics, Staudenmeyer and Gibbons."

grow up to be football coaches, let's hope that they take a couple of things with them from the Ephmen's 24-9 win.

First of all, let them be wary of instituting the wishbone with an inappropriate personnel, for, as Saturday's game proved, the unique formation can break a coach's heart as quickly as it can push a team into the win column. Secondly, let the coach-to-be, if he is interested in remaining undefeated, remember to avoid scheduling a duel with Eph coach Dick Farley and his troops.

Both of these lessons were drilled home with emphasis on Saturday, as the Ephmen raced out to a 24-0 advantage in the first 16 minutes of the game, and then took advantage of seven turnovers by the bumbling Tufts wishbone to hand the Jumbos their first setback of the year and to advance their own record to 2-0. The first quarter was as much fun to zone. Just four plays after Williams received the opening kickoff, Procanik danced 22 yards through a gaping hole to put six points on the scoreboard and smiles on the faces of the Williams faithful.

Ephs bring it to 14-0

After the extra point sailed wide, Tufts, with junior quarterback Ken Faunteroy filling in for regular Matt Ouandi, took over at their own 22. However, their march downfield was an abbreviated one, as cornerback Mike Hyde '91, playing spectacular pass defense throughout the afternoon, picked off Faunteroy's series-opening play and returned the pigskin nine yards to the Tufts 36.

After five mediocre runs and a holding call found the Ephmen facing a second-and-16, Dwyer fired a seven-yard pass to Scott Shean '91 despite tight coverage, and then brought the Ephs closer to paydirt with a 21-yard crossfield dart to tight end Matt Moynihan '92, who rumbled to the Jumbo three. Moments later, Procanik burst through a hole over right tackle for his second touchdown of the quarter, and a Dwyer run on the conversion brought the score to 14-0. The Tufts offense, however, had apparently failed to wipe the Crisco off their hands, as the second Jumbo play of the day saw a swarm of purple jerseys stop Faunteroy cold, jarring the ball loose, and then pounce on the fumble, giving the Ephmen possession at the Jumbo 34. Another holding call threw a wrench in the Eph drive, though, as Dwyer, calling signals from the choir formation, could bring his troops only to the Tufts 42-yard line. Facing fourth down, Farley sent the field goal unit onto

by Jeff Merritt

The twine behind the Williams goalkeepers was ripped only by wind last week, as the men's soccer team improved its record to 5-0 with a pair of shutout victories on the road. The Ephmen defeated Clark University 2-0 on Saturday and came up with an exciting 1-0 win over North Adams State College last Wednesday.

Williams returned from Worcester with an 11-game winning streak dating back to last season, and the team has only been scored upon once so far this season. Chuck Goldfarb '92 played well in goal, but was called upon to make only 3 saves in the entire game. Once again, the Ephs played strong on defense and controlled the flow of the action offensively.

scored goals for Williams last week. Lake leads the team with six goals, ably filling the offensive void created by the loss of last season's co-captain and leading scorer, Mike Masters '89. Hult joins the team as a transfer student from Norway, and this was his first goal on the season. The talented European midfielder has played well so far at both ends of the field, and Coach Michael Russo has high hopes for his potential contributions to the team.

Last minute win

The contest against North Adams State went right down to the wire, as the two Berkshire County rivals generated a well-played and exciting match. Last year the Ephs defeated the Mohawks 1-0 in overtime, and for a while it looked as if the two teams would be going beyond regulation time again. But Lake scored with an assist from Rob Swann '90 with 54 seconds left in the game to give the Ephmen a thrilling victory. Goalkeeper Bill Hennig '93 picked up his second shutout in two starts for Williams.

The decisive play was started by Ambli Stern '90, who won the ball at midfield and sent it over to Swann, positioned about 24 yards from the goal on the far right side of the field. Swann sent the ball towards the net, and it found its way through a crowd of Mohawk defenders but was heading wide. Lake mnnaged to get his right foot on the ball, however, and redirect it into the back of the goal.

"The team was feeling a bit of frustration near the end of the game," Lake said, "but we were still confident because we were pressing and getting a lot of chances." The Mohawks managed to

by Rhonda Goodman

The Williams women's volleyball unit went to the Bates Invitational last Friday sporting a shiny 9-0 record, and with a win over powerful Harvard fresh in their minds. The Ephwomen team left the Invitational the next evening with two wins against Tufts and Colby-Sawyer, but also suffered its first two setbacks of the season at the hands of Bates and Wellesley.

"[Bates] has two powerful hitters and we had a hard time stopping them," Ruth Burdoy '90 said. "Against Wellesley, we didn't seem able to put an attack together."

Lauree Hartace '91 added that the long drive to Bates, which takes about six hours, plus the grind of nine matches over the course of a week, began to show in the team's play.

"Our bodies were getting worn down," she said. "We were psyched for the games on Friday, but against Wellesley were kind of flat and not with it."

Although the team had not seemed flat last Tuesday, the Ephwomen had to come from behind to beat Harvard 7-15, 10-15, 16-14, 15-13, 15-10. Coach Roberts theorized that, although the team changed its strategy from hitting more to tipping, the team's willpower was the deciding factor in the match.

"When you're down two sets, it's all attitude," Roberts said.

Shelly Whelpton '90 said Harvard initially psychologically intimidated the team. "[Harvard] had superb athletes," Whelpton said. "We made stupid mistakes. Seeing their hitting warm-up intimidated us and put us in a position we had never been in before."

She also said Harvard did not take Williams seriously, putting in the second unit while the Ephwomen were making their comeback.

"They were putting in their second squad in the third game," she said. "That made us angry. We kept saying, 'We deserve to play your front line.'"

The Williams team did play the front lines of both Connecticut College and Mount Holyoke, beating them both in straight sets as they blitzed Connecticut 15-1, 15-7 and downed Mount Holyoke 15-9, 15-11.

The Ephwomen, now 11-2, hope to regain their winning disposition tomorrow against Springfield and Vassar. Hartace said the team will take their short break to do just that.

"Now that we're no longer undefeated, we need to take a step back and look at what we did and begin to get intense for Springfield," she said.

Women kickers defeat Panthers

by Kevin Greenberg

0-1, 0-1, 0-1, 1-0, 1-0, 1-0.

That's enough of a binary code to excite any computer scientist at Jesup. It also happens to be the scores of the women's soccer team's first six games.

The Ephwomen have won their last three games by the identical 1-0 margin that they lost their first three matches. After downing Smith on September 23, Williams defeated highly ranked Middlebury in overtime last Tuesday and downed Wesleyan last Saturday.

The Ephs had backed themselves into a corner with their slow start. The team needed to defeat Middlebury, one of the top-seeded teams in New England, to keep their post-season hopes alive.

The teams battled through regulation without scoring, despite many opportunities for each squad. But 3:49 into overtime a Williams corner kick ricocheted around in front of the Middlebury net. A Panther defender attempted to clear the ball, but couldn't do it decisively. Laura Anderson '92 shot the ball toward the mouth of the goal, and it glanced off of striker Sharon Glick '93 into the net for a score.

"I was at the right goalpost with the ball in front of me and the goalie behind me. The goalie grabbed my legs so I couldn't score. One of their players kicked it out and I shot it right back in. Since all of this occurred in a span of about two seconds, I was still standing at the goalpost and it deflected in off of my chest," Glick said. "I don't know why the ref didn't call the goalie for hanging onto my leg."

"The ball bounced in and out and the goalkeeper was out of position, so she was able to score," said Coach Lisa Melendy. "It was a very even game and our goaltender Sara Treworgy '93 made some very nice saves." Middlebury shot 26 times without finding the net while it was Williams' twenty-fourth shot that found the goal.

The team faced Little Three rival Wesleyan on Saturday. With 30:28 remaining in the second half, midfielder Kelly Collins '90 scored from about ten yards out of a pass from striker Liz Nasser '92. Nasser centered the ball from the right corner of the field to Collins, who inlined the team's only goal.

"We came out a little flat in the first half," said Melendy. "We are a much more skilled team than they are and they didn't really have any opportunities."

"There was only one ball I really had to make a save on," said Treworgy. "Most of the play was in their end of the field; we should have beaten them by more than we did."

The coach agrees. "One goal a game isn't necessarily going to do it for us. But we are still a real strong team defensively."

Ephs run a tough Bronx course

by Heather Smith

The men's and women's cross-country teams traveled to New York City for the New York University (NYU) Invitational last Saturday in order to compete against teams other than those that they regularly meet during the season. Both teams fared well. Although the men lost to nationally-ranked University of Rochester and Brandeis University, they easily outran Vassar and NYU, finishing third overall. The women procured yet another win Saturday to add to their ever-growing list of victories.

Running against some of the toughest competition they will meet this season and on a difficult course, the men's team held its own.

"There were no big surprises.... Looking at the rankings, that's what should have happened," said senior Kevin Walter. "[Van Courtland Park] is probably one of the most famous cross-country courses in the United States," continued Walter. "The worst hill was at [the 4.5-mile mark]. There's a hill from there to [the 4.5-mile mark] called Cemetery Hill."

The team met with an unexpected blow when Marc Beitz '91, suffering from a

by Evan Preisser

Just two days after the Chinese government protested the awarding of the Nobel Peace Prize to the Dalai Lama as an intrusion in its internal affairs, one of that country's most notorious events -- the June 4, Tiananmen Square massacre -- was discussed at Williams.

At the Saturday evening panel, entitled "Tiananmen: Politics and Progress," Professor of Political Science George Crane, Professor of History Gail Hershatler and Coordinator of China Information Center Xiao-Xia Gong, who fled China in the days after Tiananmen, re-tory of the event, as well as what it tells about the future of People's Republic.

"There is corruption and especially nepotism ruined the reforms for the people," according to Hershatler, who began the discussion by giving the crowd in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall an outline of the bases of the Democracy Days protest. Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping had made ruling the country a "family business" by appointing several close relatives to top positions. Those who benefited most from the reforms, she said, were the mid-level bureaucrats who went from being commune officials to owners and brokers of newly emerging businesses.

She also cited the government's inept economic management as another important factor in the student protests. "Every time there was a financial problem, the government solved it by merely pumping more cash into the economy." Tremendous inflation was the result, a problem that hit students and city dwellers especially hard.

Crane next added a more personal view of the events in China leading to Tiananmen. During the demonstrations he was in Nanjing, a major Chinese city, and saw a different type of protest and response than occurred in Beijing. "Protests similar to Beijing's were happening all over China -- it was a truly nationwide movement."

The spark for the protests was the death of former general secretary Hu Yaobang, a noted liberal reformer. Gatherings mourning him quickly became platforms with which to demand reforms and branched out from there.

Crane said, "The effectiveness of the protests was largely a function of the student's organizational level. In Beijing, the students organized themselves

Albion announces book buyback plan

by Linda Good

As the middle of the first term draws near, and students are thinking of ways to reap the most from the sale of their used text books, a serious question arises: will the Albion Bookstore, in its first year of operation in Williamstown, be able to offer the elusive "best deal?"

Back in March, Albion owner James Murphy told the College Council in February that Albion would buy used textbooks from students for about twenty to thirty percent of their original price, and would resell them for about half the original price. Since then there has been an adjustment in the figures.

"There are three ways that we will buy textbooks from students," store manager Gary Aller explained. "We will buy them if the books will be used for classes next semester. We will buy them if they can be sold through a company whether they will be used again or not. Or we will buy them if they can be sold in one of our three used book stores.

"We can't give a strict percentage, but we will offer the student the highest resale we can, depending on the book's condition. If the book is in good condition, we will offer half of what we think we can reasonably sell the book for."

Aller added that the only exception to the buy-back policy would be a book that has gone out of print, or has been replaced by an updated edition. Otherwise, he encourages students, "The best thing to do is bring them in and we'll buy them back for whatever we can."

He warns, however, "Highlighting

Students go to D.C. for housing march

by Keith Hedlund

Record reporter Keith Hedlund participated in the Housing Now! march last Saturday in Washington, D.C.

"The emotion level for me was a lot stronger in 1963," said Sara Mowitz, mother of Bill Mowitz '93. She had been at the 1963 Civil Rights rally at which Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr. gave his famous "I have a dream" speech. "But things are more exciting when you're nineteen and you're experiencing things for the first time."

She seemed to be making too many excuses for the Housing Now! march in Washington, D.C. in which forty or fifty Williams students participated on Saturday. We marched with forty thousand (a very conservative estimate) people from all over the nation supposedly to protest federal cuts in spending on low-income housing, but, to me, the march sometimes seemed to be more of a park rock festival than a rally for social justice.

The 1980s version of this 1960s phenomena didn't seem to meet my expectations of what a rally for the poor would be like. What the bands on the grandstand in front of the Capitol building were saying seemed to be more important to the crowd than what the signs reading "Make Homes Not War" and "Homelessness Sucks" signified. And somehow Casey Casem just couldn't rouse me to a state of worldly love.

The same thing had happened a few years ago, as celebrities from all over converged on D.C. to sleep on the streets and in shelters for a single night, to show their support for activist Mitch Snyder and his Community for Creative Non-Violence. While a lot of the people there were doing the right thing, newspaper interviews revealed an enormous number

Computer virus may hit IBMs this week; Jesup on red alert

by Robert Weisberg

Breace yourselves. Two particularly nasty computer viruses are on their way to an IBM PC near you.

The Computer Center has learned that two viruses are floating around the world, and are set to strike and destroy data on Friday and Saturday. The bugs can be caught by all IBM PCs and similar machines.

"These viruses monitor the date and time in your computer and are designed to begin destroying data after the 12th and 13th of October," according to a press release from Jesup.

"Concerned users should bring a formatted floppy disk to the first floor of Jesup and see the computer center consultants," it continues. The consultants have more information about the viruses and have detection programs as well.

According to Computer Center Technical Analyst Michael Martys, "The viruses are called the Jerusalem Virus because it was first noticed in Israel and Data Crime, a copy of another virus." He said that the two have not been noticed yet at Williams, but that computer center personnel are monitoring closely the heavily used PCs, such as those in faculty offices.

The computer center found out about the viruses from a former student who now works for Microsoft Word, a major software company, Martys said. "We monitor mailing lists countrywide," Martys said. "When we hear of something, we tell everyone about it. People are worried about viruses, and while there are many people making viruses, there are even more people looking out for them."

Last fall, Jesup was invaded by a Macintosh virus that infected many Hesal disks for some computer science classes. While that virus was eradicated rather quickly, and caused little damage, it has left Jesup with a heightened wariness against viruses. The virus that may hit this week appears to be more malicious, however.

"We normally don't go this route," Martys said, concerning this unusual step of alerting all potential Jesup users to a coming virus. "But this is a good time to get the campus aware about not just this virus, but about computer viruses in general, and what people can do," he said.

CEP debates a major revision

by Damon Hemmerdinger

A restructuring of the anthropology and sociology majors was proposed by the department to the Committee on Educational Policy last Thursday. On behalf of the department, Chairman of the Department of Anthropology and Sociology Robert Jackall proposed a revision of the major sequences and the addition of a comprehensive examination for both majors.

At the meeting, Jackall explained that approximately 85% of sociologists look at sociological problems using statistics, or what he called "quantitative positivism." Yet the department believes that emphasizing field work is more appropriate in what Jackall terms the "Williams context."

"We don't see Ph.D.s as our final project," he said. "Most of our students are going into affairs of one form or another. We want to prepare them for that. We see the unity of the social sciences and see that vision as essential to Williams College."

To this end, Jackall would like to see the department further unified. He advocated linking the major programs by requiring joint courses in the sophomore and junior years. The two courses, Anthropology/Sociology 205 Ways of Knowing and 305 Social Theory, would reflect the department's new emphasis on qualitative analysis.

"We would like to use these courses as a way to centralize our thoughts and use it as a forum to invite colleagues to present work on social theory," Jackall said.

Assistant Professor of Psychology Laurie Heatherington expressed concern that students would not be prepared for graduate work after following a non-traditional course of study.

"We can teach something that they're not going to get in grad school," Jackall said. "Our kids are bright enough to pick up what they need to. Any student who indicates that he wants to go on in sociology will know what he's not getting. We

Bring back unannounced Mountain Day

Last Sunday was Mountain Day. The weather was nice enough, falling just on the cool side of pleasant, but it was a fine day to be out and about. Unfortunately, for the second year in a row, the majority of Williams students took little notice of the festivities.

The reason is no great mystery. Mountain Day is no longer a real holiday. After the 1987-88 school year, the Calendar Committee decided to shorten Thanksgiving break and add a two-day midweek reading period. In doing so, they changed Mountain Day from a Monday with no scheduled classes to a Sunday, when classes would normally not be scheduled. They could hardly have picked a worse day.

Sunday is the one day on which Williams students have the greatest amount of work. All the reading ignored on Friday and Saturday looms as a dragon to be slain by Monday morning. The temptation is to hike the stairs of Sawyer Library rather than scale the summit of Mt. Greylock. Sunday might be called Mountain Day, but it is a vacation far too late.

Would it really have been so difficult for the school to give students and faculty yesterday off from classes? It was, after all, Columbus Day. None of the college administrative offices were open, yet students were required to attend class. Why not give students one legitimate day of vacation in autumn to enjoy the beauty of the area? In the old days, Mountain Day was not a scheduled holiday at all. The president would merely wake up on a particularly lovely day in the fall and declare that classes were cancelled. The bells would ring, and the students would head for the hills. That is what Mountain Day should be all about. When the vacation comes as a surprise, no one feels compelled to spend the day at work. For those who stayed up all night writing a paper for a class that was cancelled, so much the better. Their work is finished and there is good reason to celebrate. In addition, there need be no worry about good weather, because the president would be sure to select a gorgeous day. A scheduled holiday is better than the current situation of no holiday at all, but an unannounced one would be true cause for rejoicing.

The idea of having a day to enjoy the mountains is a splendid one. Students really do need to take time to look around. It is far too easy never to look up from one's textbook and see the mountains. Tourists come from all over the country to view the area's beautiful fall foliage, but students are begrudged even a single day to glory in the scenery.

The implication that a midweek reading period serves as a substitute for Mountain Day is absurd. Reading period is just that - a time to read, study and prepare for the onslaught of mid-year papers and exams. It is anything but a vacation.

Mountain Day is one of the magnificent traditions of Williams College. It is worth keeping, but it is also worth doing right. The college should bring back the unannounced fall holiday that really encouraged students not to take their work too seriously, and to escape for at least one day of sheer revelry in the glorious outdoors.

Science libraries here are disgraceful

by Matthew Esposito and Jon Friedberg

For a school which prides itself on services and facilities, Williams College has a truly disgraceful system of science libraries. A quick examination of comparable universities and colleges indicates that Williams College stands alone in such lowly repute.

The science library facility on our campus is composed of six decentralized libraries scattered throughout five separate buildings. Such libraries were designed to accommodate departmental holdings in a single room allowing both students and faculty easy access to books and journals. Unfortunately, our needs have changed in the past 30 years. The most obvious and visual problem is space, or rather the lack of space. In the biology library there is no room to add new books or periodicals. In truth, there is no room for our present collection of written material, and many publications are currently stored at Mt. Hope Farm and Sitsun library.

Mildew at Mt. Hope

Such storage is neither appropriate (mildew and mold at Mt. Hope endangers our collection) nor accessible to the student writing a paper with a deadline. The chemistry and physics departments share similar space constraints.

More insidious to the students, however, is the complete lack of staffing and administration of the science libraries. Presently, there is one librarian assigned to coordinate all six libraries; his office is across Route 2 in Sawyer.

His main responsibility, in reality, has been to assist as a part-time general reference librarian in Sawyer whenever it is short-staffed. Consequently, he is leaving Williams to become head science librarian at Kenyon College, and a forthcoming replacement is dubious due to budgetary constraints. How can Williams continue to discriminate against such a large number of its student body in this regard?

There is no supervision of materials available in the science libraries and books walk. More to the point, students enrolled in any biology class will encounter the frustration of the missing journal. Certainly the professor placed bases to gather complete information on a given topic. Presently, students are unable to take advantage of our vast array of journal subscriptions and texts since it is so difficult to compile a list of titles on any subject.

the material in the "reserve" shelf, but how long did it remain there? A minute? An hour? A day, maybe? What about the other 25 students in the class who need to prepare for lecture? This is not a problem in a vacuum, it happens in most upper level classes each semester.

Unique research needs
Science students of today have unique research needs due to the tremendous proliferation of periodicals and research publications in the past ten years. Modern research involves utilizing computerized searches and commercial data-

This is a plea for the bare minimum. More "progressive" institutions such as Swarthmore and even Smith have such services; are our purple hills really so remote? Williams has begun to reflect the many changes in the nature of contemporary science. The boundaries between the traditional scientific disciplines are quickly fading. Recently, a Biochemistry and Molecular Biology program has been introduced to bridge the disciplines of biology and chemistry; contract majors such as Neurobiology function to allow other interdisciplinary studies.

Under our antiquated science library system it is tedious and frustrating to research in these areas. Which library would you research the physical dynamics of Neurochemistry? There is really only one solution. Smith knows it; Wesleyan, Bowdoin, Wellesley, Kenyon, Oberlin, Franklin and Marshall, Holyoke, Union, Hamilton, Colgate, Holy Cross, Middlebury, Davidson, Grinnell, Colby and of course Swarthmore, the number one liberal arts college as judged by US News and World Report, know it as well.

Williams needs to centralize all of its valuable scientific literature into a single facility as Amherst plans to do. This may be accomplished in two ways. The existing Sawyer structure might be expanded to accommodate all college holdings for the three divisions. This would eliminate staffing and security difficulties, and allow for the first time, equal services for science students. Engineering constraints, however, may preclude this possibility.

A second, more attractive alternative is the building of a single science library incorporating all Division III departments and psychology. This is not a proposal for a science center, but rather for a centralized science library housing journals, books, complete reference services and work space for students and faculty alike. Current departmental facilities might be retained as small reading/quiet areas.

The future of our reputation as a liberal arts "leader" is at stake. The natural sciences are every bit as important as either the humanities or the social sciences; we are falling grossly behind other institutions which supposedly follow our lead. The present situation is an embarrassment to our college. With the capital fund drive just beginning, we call on President O'Neil to consider this matter as high priority.

Matthew Esposito and Jon Friedberg both serve on the Biology Majors Advisory Committee.

Awareness is the key to stopping rape

by Jonquil Wolfson
and Michelle Sanders

Our freshman year we heard about a woman who had been raped on campus the year before. It was the first time we had heard of violence on campus and it scared us. According to the story, the dean's first reaction had been to try to convince the woman to say that her attacker had not been a Williams student, and this detail only compounded the horror of the story.

Why, we wondered, had the dean wanted to hide the fact that such things happen at Williams? We assumed they were afraid to tarnish the school's image. We went to some meetings of the Feminist Alliance, and the main response we heard was that the campus should be made safer -- primarily by putting up new lights in dark areas.

Well, making the campus safer is a good idea. But unfortunately, all the lights are now up, and there is still rape at Williams. We no longer assume that the administration doesn't care about the problem; this fall, for the first time, freshmen were shown a movie about date rape, followed by organized talks.

Nor do we assume the deans don't respect the severity of the problem; members of the Alliance spoke with deans who were open and concerned and wanted to help us work on this problem. Yet despite the administration's attitude and the movie the freshmen saw, rape is still a problem at Williams -- almost certainly someone has been raped on campus since the beginning of this school year.

A lack of knowledge
Which poses the question of why rape happens. Of course, there are many answers to this question, but the one that seems the most applicable at Williams is lack of knowledge. Many students -- men and women alike -- do not fully understand what rape is. Many people do not know how to react should they or a friend be raped or sexually harassed. Many are not even aware that rape is a problem in this small, "safe" town, just as it is in the rest of the world. The myths that surround rape make it difficult to identify and deal with.

The Rape Crisis Center has estimated that as much as 90 percent of all rapes in Berkshire County are by an acquaintance of the victim. And most rapists are not deranged men waiting in back alleys with knives -- they are normal human beings, even students at this school. They may not even know they've done anything wrong. And this opens up one prime way to help stop rape -- if everyone knows what rape is, it can't happen "accidentally."

comes in. Obviously no one is pro-rape, but the Feminist Alliance, a group of men and women who are concerned with the issues that women face in our society, is deeply committed to working against rape. The display case in Baxter last week was the first of many things we hope to do to make this campus more "rape aware."

Our intention in setting up the display was to make people aware that rape happens at Williams. We were not interfering with anyone's freedom of expression. Obviously no one is pro-rape, but the display was not meant to imply that they are. Feeling uncomfortable and accused, however, is not necessarily a laughing matter. These emotions can be used in a constructive way to increase one's respect and awareness for other people's rights and needs.

The case asked people, "How Do You Define Rape?", and obviously answers varied. But we think that any definition must indicate that any force, any coercion, any overriding of a partner's protest, changes what is going on from sexual behavior between partners to a power struggle where one person is a victim.

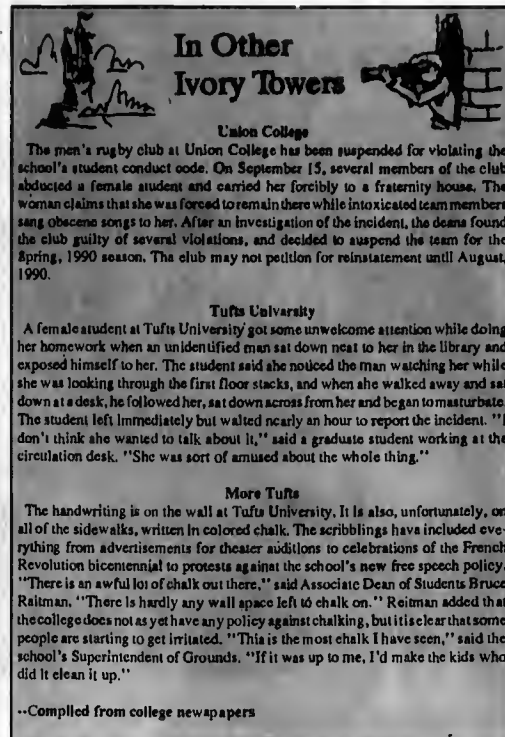

At least that is what I am told; and what the metaphor lacks in poetry it makes up for in sentiment. Winter temperatures hover around -18 degrees Celsius. Admittedly, the last Division Three court I took was "Anatomy of an Undergraduate Got," but isn't that equal to zero degrees Fahrenheit?

I have been sick as a dog the last few days. Everyone has. Call it what you will -- Aztec twin-step, Montezuma's Revenge, Hong Kong Dog, Beijing Belly. The program I am associated with is giving us a stipend to buy meals at local restaurants. There are four restaurants nearby, all with highly descriptive names: the Red Room (purgatory), the Dich (that is the Chinese name), the Dich house (free growing out of the middle of the floor; a favorite hangout with local dogs) and the Phoenix (your gorge dies, only to rise again).

The selection of dishes is limited only by our skill at reading the menu, which means that we eat the same four things every night. In China, "meat" is a notoriety collection of bones, fat and gristle all competing to be number one in your stomach. It is this that we need to be aware of the people we're with, to listen to what they say, even to ask how they feel.

Learning to ask, "Is this okay?" and to be honest in our answers, to say "No" if that's how we feel and to mean "Yes" if we say it, is the most important thing we can do to keep each other and ourselves from feeling violated.

Living the good life in the People's Republic of China

by Bill Savadove

I have always considered journal writing to be the literary equivalent of masturbation -- a purely self-indulgent exercise. Don't let anyone see you do it, and if you do it every day you'll go blind. But here I am, pen in hand, initiating a sporadic travelogue. Personally, I'm not really sure why you want to hear about following a drunken airborne ranger into a stripjoint on Central, being swindled by "Jenny" of the "Hang Tai Camera and Audio Company" on Kowloon, changing money on the black market, searching for the snake meat restaurant in Canton, sharing a cramped train compartment with three North Koreans for 34 hours, or riding a bike in Tiananmen Square.

I am living in northeast China, closer to the Soviet and Korean borders than Beijing, in the industrial city of Harbin, on the continent where they put the elephant into elephantiasis. In Harbin, the wind doesn't blow, it sucks. At least that is what I am told; and what the metaphor lacks in poetry it makes up for in sentiment. Winter temperatures hover around -18 degrees Celsius. Admittedly, the last Division Three court I took was "Anatomy of an Undergraduate Got," but isn't that equal to zero degrees Fahrenheit?

heartburn. It will be a sad but momentous occasion when I begin to miss Baxter Shoyu chicken thighs.

The toilets here on the third floor of Dormitory Six are all backed up with overuse. There are over a billion people in this country, and none of them are plumbers. I think all the plumbers were purged during the Cultural Revolution.

Still, the rooms are quite comfortable. Each suite has two large doubles and an attached bathroom. The floor has an attached heater which keeps us supplied with boiled drinking water.

My Chinese roommate is a bit mysterious. All the roommates come from the precision instruments department of the school, Harbin Institute of Technology being the MIT of China. My roommate appears to live out a small green satchel. Besides smoking cigarettes and listening to Chinese opera, he has no apparent bad habits.

The other night, I walked into the room and caught him listening to one of my Grateful Dead bootlegs. "Well the first days are the hardest days don't you worry any more." Words of wisdom from Jerry. I am grooming my roommate to be the standard-bearer for the next cultural revolution, one in which China rises itself of disco, turns on and learns to dance wildly for ours with no apparent reason.

Like I said, a purely self-indulgent exercise. This is one old Asian hand (with hairy palms) signing off.

Joie de vivre comes to astronomy department

by Navin Girishankar

You might think someone who has helped the family of a Soviet dissident get in the West would be a swashbuckling, James Bond-like figure. But Williams has just such an individual on campus, residing for this semester in the astronomy department.

Renowned astrophysicist Jean-Claude Pecker is a visiting professor of astronomy at Williams. Pecker will teach at Williams for the next semester, after which he plans to return to Paris.

Pecker and another fellow French physicist were instrumental in helping the family of Andrei Sakharov, the imprisoned Nobel Peace Prize winner, emigrate from the Soviet Union. "I went to USSR to help Sakharov when he was doing his hunger strike. I was the one, along with my friend Michel, a physicist, who got the visa for his [Sakharov's] daughter-in-law from the Soviet authorities. It was a very hectic week, but we succeeded."

He is a product of the French educational system. "Being French, I have had the most classical French training, one which is generally considered the best."

After receiving his baccalaureate in Bordeaux, Pecker was accepted into the Ecole Normale Supérieure. "It is considered by many, let us say by most, as the best college in France."

Pecker has also occupied a central place in the scientific community, leading some of the most selective committees. In the sixties, he served as the Assistant General Secretary and General Secretary of the International Astronomical Union, a worldwide association of astronomers. He later served as the director of the Institute of Astronomy at Paris. He is the vice-president of the Academia Europaea, an organization of European professors.

This year, Pecker has been chosen Commissaire General of the celebrations of the 50th anniversary of the CNRS, which will be held between October 16th and 22nd. The celebrations will be attended by French president Francois Mitterrand.

But what brought such a man to Williams College, about as far, geographically and culturally, as one can get from the City of Light? He came to Williams upon the invitation of his friend and fellow astronomer, Field Memorial Professor of Astronomy Jay Pasachoff.

"I find the atmosphere of the campus extremely pleasant, very good for creating an atmosphere of work," Pecker said. "When I want to work, I want some peace of mind, I have more peace of mind here than in Paris where I have all kinds of committees." Pecker is teaching two courses for the astronomy department this semester: History of Ideas of Astronomy and Solar and Stellar Atmospheres.

"I like the students very much. They are open, asking, and demanding in 207 [Solar and Stellar Atmospheres] as in 331 [History of Ideas of Astronomy]. In particular, 331 is a fascinating course because all the people in front of me come from completely different horizons," Pecker said.

"Some are interested in social sciences, some are students in theater, some want to major in philosophy, some want to major in physics. That's the thing we didn't have in France at all, this variety of the student group. I am delighted to have people coming from so diverse interests. It leads to a dialogue."

In 1950, Pecker received his doctorate in astrophysics from the Institut Astro-physique in Paris. The subject of his thesis was "A Contribution to the Study of the Spectral Type."

Work in U.S.
Pecker then spent time in the United States doing research. In 1952, as a recipient of a Fulbright Scholarship, Pecker continued his research of astronomy in Boulder, Colorado. At the same time, he was a fellow at the CNRS, Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique in France. In 1963 Pecker was elected as professor of astrophysics at the College de France, where he continued to teach until the age of 65.

The study of the sun is his main interest in the field of astronomy. "I am a man of various, maybe too various interests. I have a tendency to disperse myself. But, my main interest is and has been for a long time the study of the Sun's atmosphere. The Sun, which is our star, is, for me, a fascinating object and its knowledge is easier than others because it's so near us and therefore we can study it in greater detail. Life on the Earth is really dominated by solar influences," he said.

The solar and stellar atmospheres have been the topics of three of his books and several papers. He has also been involved in cosmology, the study of the visible universe. He says he is one of the few generally decreases the value of the book. Think of it as a continuum from never-been-marked to beat up and bent up. We'll look at anything."

According to former Pooh Peeper owner Mark Elefante, that now-disbanded student-run organization taken over by Albion last year sold books for two-thirds what they cost originally, and gave the student three-quarters of that, so that the student selling the book would end up with about half of the book's original price. After, however, was quick to point out that the Pooh did not give the student the money right away.

"When the Pooh was turned over, thousands and thousands of books were left unsold. At Albion we take all the risks. You get your money up front. "I think the system works well for both the student selling and the student buying a used book. Prices are substantially reduced, and in the spring we will be able to offer significant numbers of used books."

"It's been a good system, the most fair I've been associated with. We've used it at Amherst and the University of Massachusetts, and it's been successful. It won't lose us money, but we can provide the right book at the right price."

Mixed reactions

Student reactions to the policy were mixed. Greg Robinson '92 was ambivalent: "It sounds pretty fair to me on the basis that he's a bookseller and is out to make money, but the Pooh was definitely a better deal for students."

Krissy Coombs '91 said, "I think the fact that you're getting the money up front is good. But all this negotiating about its condition is ridiculous. A used book is a used book. It's not a peace treaty."

Olga Mielman '93 was less enthusiastic: "My first reaction is that you're better off just keeping the book." Alier, nevertheless, is still optimistic: "I've been involved in the textbook business for five years and I'm excited about what we have to offer. Any way I can supply used textbooks, I'm going to."

Fusili Club worships nefarious noodle

by Tom Dupree

The Sixties brought organized protest to college campuses nationwide. The Seventies were characterized by excessive tackiness; the Eighties by complacency. As we stand on the brink of a new decade, many leading scholars feel they have already pinpointed the trademark of the Nineties here at Williams College: fusilli.

The Fusilli Club is a student-run organization dedicated to the enjoyment of the small screw-shaped pasta noodle served somewhat infrequently in the campus dining halls. Although the club was founded earlier this year, it already boasts over 150 members.

According to Mark Sutton '92, one of the club's leaders, "It's very easy to become a member. We're not a fraternal organization."

The Fusilli Club Manifesto, written by the Club's leaders, serves as its constitution. Rule 11, Section A, Paragraph 1 reads, "All those considering membership shall be admitted, unless they don't express interest in doing so."

Sutton said, "We are united by our love of fusilli. We want to see it served in the dining halls as often as possible. Our ambition is fueled by our hunger."

Fusilli Club members are unanimously enthusiastic about their favorite little noodle. Doug Smith '92 said, "No longer do I want to be one of the silent majority. I want my voice to be heard on this campus. Serve more fusilli!"

Karen Gray '92 said, "Fusilli is hot. My classes pass in a blur on the nights they serve fusilli."

Chris Holderman '91 added, "It's just a sort of strange way to have fun. They are kind of neat noodles."

'My classes pass in a blur on the nights they serve fusilli'

Some students are puzzled about the reasons behind the Club's existence. Carolyn Koo '92 said, "What do they do? They just sit around and eat pasta. It's all very mysterious. Do they do anything else?"

The Fusilli Club Idea Sheet contains a summary of the Club's goals, many of which are not limited to the Williams campus. For example, one member suggested, "For good P.R., all new members must donate an organ to the nearest hospital." Other plans include all-campus fusilli wrestling and a fusilli talk show on WCFM.

The Club also tracks important moments in the history of fusilli. The Club's quote board features the famous line uttered by Michael Dukakis during his presidential campaign, the words they say ultimately led to his downfall. "I am a card-carrying member of the Fusilli Club."

According to the quote board, many well-known historical figures were also voracious fusilli eaters. In a tribute to fusilli, Lord Byron wrote, "Let thy precious sauce flow like a wellspring from my awe-slackened orifice." Byron's poem is followed on the quote board by Marie Antoinette's famous, "Let them eat fusilli!"

In coordinating group activities, Sutton emphasized the importance of the Fusilli Club Newsletter, which is mailed to all members. "We recently held a rap-writing campaign in all five dining halls," he said. "The response was tremendous. Dining Services was overwhelmed by aren't getting rid of the empirical social science course. They can still take that class."

Personnel problems

Professor of Economics Henry Bruton said he thought that the department would run into personnel problems. But Jackall said he was not worried. "Yes, we are limiting the pool of people, but there is no question that there are good people out there."

"The overall feeling of the committee," CEP Chairman William Fox said, "seems to be in support of what [the department] is doing."

The discussion about the department's proposal to administer comprehensive exams to all majors was more heated. Jackall maintained that the comprehensive exams would be valuable tools in synthesizing four years of material.

"We are trying to fashion a degree of coherence for both majors through the comprehensive exam," he said. The proposal would require all anthropology and sociology majors except those writing an honors thesis to take a comprehensive exam before spring break of their senior year.

Registrar Charles Toomajian, Dean of the Faculty John Reichert and Associate Professor of German Bruce Kieffer were concerned about the fate of seniors who fall the exam. Bruton recommended, with support from several committee members, that the exam be administered in the fall of the senior year or as part of the senior seminar.

"It seems to me an extra thing. I wouldn't like it," Joshua Brumberg '92 said. "It seems you could fit it in with the existing structure. I think it would make good sense to have it be a part of the senior seminar."

The department had proposed orienting its tutorial towards preparation for the comprehensive exam. Fox said he thought that students would almost be forced to take the tutorial. Students might feel, he said, that those who did not take the tutorial would not be as well prepared as those who did.

In addition, the CEP asked Jackall to reconsider excusing students writing an honors thesis. Kieffer said, "The thesis is supposed to be in addition to everything else."

Fox closed this portion of the meeting by reminding those present that this proposal is not a final one. The department asked for this hearing for CEP input. The final proposal will be made with the presentation of the course packet in February.

Chinese exchange rates drop at U.S. colleges and universities

College Press Service

Preliminary accounts reveal that the number of Chinese students enrolled at U.S. colleges this fall has dropped sharply from last year.

According to State Department spokesman Kenneth Bailes, up to half of the 40,000 Chinese students who were studying in the U.S. last year may not have returned. No definite figures are yet available.

The drop in enrollment indicates a smaller number of new students coming from China. Most of the students who studied in the U.S. last year remain here but not all have re-enrolled this fall. In fact many have become activists.

Shengfeng Feng left Princeton University to form the China Solidarity Committee in Washington D.C. "Basically, we are trying to save lives," Feng said.

Since the June 4 massacre of pro-democracy students in Beijing's

Tiananmen Square, martial law has been imposed and many student demonstrators have been jailed or executed.

Chinese officials also suspended participation in the Fulbright program and cancelled all exchanges of American and Chinese scholars. They also added an extra security check for students to pass in order to study abroad in the U.S. and elsewhere. This extra security check appears to be a major obstacle.

"Those who have arrived have indicated to me that they had big problems getting out," Glenn Morrison, dean of the graduate school at University of Rhode Island, said.

"We can't help but think we'll have problems," Bill Barnhart, director of the International Center at the University of Utah, said. "It's a real dilemma. We may not even be able to run our research programs."

At Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government only two of the six Chinese students expected showed up for a summer fellowship program. At the University of California at Berkeley only about half of the 80 students originally expected will attend this fall, Marvin Baron, director of the school's international office said.

A host of schools say it is still too early to tell if China's crackdown will significantly affect fall enrollment. Gary Alier, assistant director for international education and services at the University of Iowa, said, "As far as we can tell, it hasn't had a negative effect."

Other schools are working to provide financial assistance to Chinese students financially stranded in the U.S. because of the disruptions at home. For instance, officials at the University of California at Santa Cruz have established an assistance fund and an anonymous donor gave Princeton a million dollars to help out Chinese students in need.

Morrison said, "I know a lot of professors who are paying out of their own pockets."

Chinese Embassy condemns Nobel Prize awarded to the Dalai Lama

The 1989 Nobel Peace Prize was awarded on Thursday to the Dalai Lama, the exiled religious and political leader of Tibet, in recognition of his non-violent campaign to end the People's Republic of China's domination over Tibet. The award follows the violent suppression of the Chinese democracy movement in June as well as the crushing of pro-independence demonstrations and the imposition of martial law in Tibet's capital, Lhasa. The Chinese Embassy in Oslo, Norway, immediately condemned the committee's decision as interference in China's affairs. The award to the 54-year-old Tibetan Buddhist leader, who fled to India in 1959 after an abortive uprising against Chinese rule, was not mentioned on the television news in Beijing or by the official New China News Agency.

A coup attempt by middle-level officers against Panamanian ruler Manuel Antonio Noriega failed last Tuesday after several hours of fighting in the capital. Units loyal to Noriega regained control of the main barracks in the Panama Defense Forces headquarters, which rebellious troops of undetermined number were occupying in Panama City, President George Bush originally denied that the U.S. government instigated the coup attempt, but later recanted; National Security Advisor Brent Scowcroft said that plans were made to arrest Noriega during the chaos, though only if no violence would have been necessary to do so. Congressmen criticized Bush for not providing more assistance or taking more chances to seize Noriega, who is wanted in the U.S. on drug trafficking charges. Chief of Staff John Sununu has promised an internal investigation into the poor handling of this administration's first foreign policy debacle.

Gorbachev in Berlin supports East German Communists in crisis

President Mikhail S. Gorbachev of the Soviet Union arrived in Berlin on Friday as part of the 40th anniversary of that nation's adoption of a Communist regime. East German leaders had hoped that Gorbachev would demonstrate support for East Germany's closure of her borders during the last week, as thousands of citizens attempted to flee to the West. The government response has been confusing, as officials alternately allowed people to get visas and flee by train through Hungary and Czechoslovakia and then completely shut the borders, even firing on people. East Germany allowed its citizens already in Czechoslovakia to head west, then closed its borders last Tuesday in an attempt to stop the exodus of East Germans to the West. The numbers fleeing East Germany passed the 45,000 mark on Friday. Gorbachev made no mention of the incident, though he said that East Germany would have to solve such problems on its own.

Bakker convicted of fraud

Television evangelist Jim Bakker, who begged for money to do the Lord's work and then lived the worldly life of a prince, was convicted Thursday in federal court of swindling $3.7 million from his followers. Bakker is still declaring his innocence although he was found guilty on all 24 counts of wire fraud, mail fraud and conspiracy. He could be sentenced to as much as 120 years in prison and fined more than $3 million on Oct. 24.

The House of Representatives voted 360-66 Wednesday to repeal the program which expanded health benefits for older Americans which was enacted little more than a year ago. The House vote was in response to the protest of hundreds of thousands of more affluent older Americans who resented paying a surtax to help finance the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act, which duplicated benefits that many of them received as retirees. Washington-watchers have theorized that the Senate voted to keep some of the benefits in action because it is more removed from constant reelection pressures. A conference committee will try to create a unified law soon.

by academic departments -- the more reluctant students thus knew the protesters well and had ties to the demonstrations. In Nanjing, on the other hand, the students were very disorganized and allowed governmental pressure to stop demonstrations quickly.

"The central government that normally would have dealt with the protests was politically stalemated at the top levels," Crane said, citing this as the reason that the protests went on for so long without governmental intervention. "In Nanjing, local party leaders provided soda pop to the demonstrators. Without a firm edict from Beijing, many officials merely sat on the fence between cracking down and supporting the demonstrators."

Xiao-Xia Gong, coordinator of the China Information Center, a newly-formed national clearinghouse of accurate information on the massacre and the activities of pro-democracy activists in China and elsewhere, then provided a student's view of the uprising. "The protests came out of a Communist and not a democratic tradition," she said, pointing out that Mao himself used student protest to achieve his ends. "In the Communist tradition, we were trained to be revolutionaries and organize large movements."

"The student organizations that sprang up outside of China were at first very fragmentary," Gong said. "In June and July the State Department listed $500 Chinese protest-aid groups in the United States alone." She said the situation improved when the student leaders began to escape from China after the July 4 massacre and reorganized some of the groups.

The role of the media was another important issue. Although all agreed that it was instrumental in organizing worldwide support for the protesters, it also had some negative effects. "CNN and other news programs took many dramatic pictures of both students and the citizens," Crane said, "but to see the same footage broadcast on Chinese T.V. with instructions to report anyone seen in the picture to the authorities had a very chilling effect."

The Chinese Association, International Club, and Amnesty International sponsored the event.

Concert by new group shows innovation in the Berkshires

by Beth Neely

All too often we assume that the most professional, innovative, and exciting musical performances are happening in Boston or New York, but the premiere performances by the new group for Twentieth Century Music last Friday and Saturday proved that great vigor and professionalism are thriving here in the Berkshires.

The excellent programming and engaging delivery of works made the small, but enthusiastic, audience of about 100 demand four curtain calls at the end of the Friday program.

The concert, organized by Professor of Music Robert Suderburg, composer in residence, featured works of Schoenberg, Cowell, Varese, and Kechley. The group may have been new, but the performers were genuinely seasoned in the repertoire and in making a group work together as an ensemble to make new music live.

The musicians in the concert were Elizabeth Suderburg, voice; Judith Nelson, violin; Felix Skowronek, flute; William McCall, clarinet; Doris Sieveken, piano; Timothy Baker, violin; Douglas Mays, cello; and Robert Suderburg, piano and conductor.

"Pierrot lunaire," Schoenberg's monumental expressionistic masterpiece of twenty-one poems by Albert Girauds, grabbed the audience's attention and held it. Elizabeth Suderburg's Sprechstimme cast a spell over the listeners as they sat captivated to the uninhibited expression of moonstruck Pierrot in a kaleidoscope of desires, moods, and emotions.

The great difficulty in the "speech song" concept is that except for a few passages, the voice part should not remind us of a song in the traditional sense, and it must never deteriorate into sing-song. Suderburg succeeded this challenge as she conveyed Pierrot's most inner experiences with an infinite variety of tones, ranging from a murmured foreboding, to a morose lament, to an almost hysterical faunting. She was wonderfully on top of every German syllable, and even her whispered pianos pierced every last seat. The ensemble in the Schoenberg capitalized on the tension of the work being a storybook record which has gone somehow wrong, the music prances around, disregarding most of the words. The ensemble illustrated the best example of this in a poem entitled "Serenade," in which the Sprechstimme narrated: "With a bow grotesque and monstrous, Pierrot scrapes away at his viola." In exact opposite, however, Moore eeked out a plaintive, whining, melody on the cello for all that it was worth.

Robert Suderburg, as director, held the ensemble together well, a great feat considering the individuality of the parts. It took forty rehearsals to bring the work to performance for the first time in Berlin in 1912. This fine control in an area where other musicians fall apart is one of the values of seasoned performers and directors of twentieth century music.

Perhaps the most stirring moment of the work was its ending, when a short tonal duet played by Nelson and Moore emerged out of the stoniness, and Elizabeth Suderburg's voice, bare and alone at the end, whispered hauntingly of an old fragrance from days gone by.

The concert opened with Cowell's "Toccata" for soprano, flute, cello, and piano. The ensemble exuded a sense of power, sometimes quiet and sometimes spilling over, in the rising melodic lines. The piece had the pure quality of a Rachmaninoff Vocalise, especially in the first two movements, and was a marked difference in style from other types of writing Cowell is known for, such as that which makes use of plucked strings inside the piano.

The Varese selection, "Density 21.5 for unaccompanied flute," featured guest artist Skowronek in a solo which put into music the thoughts of someone alone in a room, thinking freely and associatively. Skowronek created many varieties of tone, from full, rounded lower notes to breathy, shrill jabs of sound in the upper register. The piece produced sensations not far removed from Debussy's "Syrinx." Perhaps both pieces give the same exposure to the private meditations and loose improvisations of soul who has let down its barriers for a moment.

Closing the first half of the program was the virtuosic Sonata for Viola and Piano by Professor of Music David Kechley. It was once described as a work of "touching funkiness, sophisticated humor, and a clear grasp of the viola's throaty personality." The performance this weekend illustrated most of these attributes, but some of the syncopated jazz rhythms might have been more effective if Stevenson and Nelson had taken them with more of a spirit of wit and play. The restless, offbeat rhythms are what give much of the piece its character.

The piano was as active as the viola in the work, and the writing, like Aaron Copland's writing for piano, truly exploited the great range of the instrument. This was most apparent in a climax near the end of the work, which was intensified by the use of the very top and bottom notes of the piano all at once. Nelson's playing exuded both persevering energy and some full lyrical lines in the Ballata.

Schools crack down on dorm room visits

College Press Service

In what may be the harshest version of a nationwide trend toward regulating activity in student dorm rooms, Kentucky State University has forbidden freshmen from having visitors of the opposite sex in their rooms. At any time.

KSU decided to end all opposite-sex visits this fall, spokesman Joseph Burgess said, as a way to help freshmen "acclimate" themselves to college life. The rule would also cut the number of freshmen on academic probation and make the dorms more secure.

Students under 21 are required to live on-campus. Sophomores, juniors and seniors are allowed to have opposite-sex visitors on weeknights from 6 p.m. to 11 p.m. On Friday and Saturday, visits are allowed from noon to 2 a.m.

The student handbook says open visitation is a privilege and is for the purpose of "encouraging wholesome social and academic development." Students can be expelled if they violate dorm rules, which expressly forbid unauthorized residence entry after visiting hours and rape or sexual intercourse in a residence hall room.

KSU also cut visiting hours during Homecoming weekend for all dorm students. In the past dorm residents had a 72-hour open visitation period. A KSU student was reportedly raped by five men in her dorm room last year during Homecoming. The five men were later acquitted.

Burgess said that the new students really don't mind the rule since they've never experienced "open visitation" before. "There's been very little outward indication of displeasure."

However, James Morgan '93 said, "It's not fair. Everybody should have the same privileges."

He said that most of his friends were unhappy with the rule and added, "Just because we're freshmen doesn't mean we can't handle [open visitation]. KSU students are not the only ones who dislike the changes."

Boston U. protests
Boston University students have protested with angry marches, petition drives and appeals to the media. BU officials began limiting the number of times students are allowed overnight visitors and banning overnight stay by members of the opposite sex altogether.

At the University of South Carolina only 27 out of a class of 2800 incoming freshmen have signed up for 675 dorm rooms set aside as no-overnight-guest rooms.

St. Joseph's College in Maine, the State University of New York at Binghamton, North Carolina State University and the University of South Carolina, among others, have restricted dorm room visits. They do allow visiting during most hours of the day.

The last laugh

A tribute to Graham Chapman, 1941-1989

by Robert Weisberg

All around campus you see them. Small tributes, to be sure, but nevertheless touching. Written on those little memo boards on dorm room doors, they are usually as simple as "Graham Chapman 1941-1989." Rarely has an entertainer's passing caused such a reaction.

What do you do when someone so funny dies? Sadness is mandatory, but when you begin thinking of Chapman putting mock smiles on his head and howling like a strident moose as John Cleese counts out loud, a smile is impossible to suppress.

From the King Arthur who couldn't say the number three, to the mistaken messiah who exposes himself to the multitudes of Jerusalem to the squeamish sergeant who vomited in his cap on Broadway, Chapman was on the cutting edge of comedy. In fact, with Monty Python's Flying Circus, he was more often than not over it. If anyone is credited with having saved Western Civilization from the barbaric hordes who have turned the television into a device of demonic torment, it could very well be Graham Chapman.

If anyone is credited with saving Western Civilization... it could very well be Graham Chapman.

Chapman, who died last week of cancer at age 48, has turned to a thing of beauty. In an age of McSicoms, Monty Python is a breath of fresh air. Try comparing "Roses" to Mr. Neutron. If you prefer the former, report to Psych Services immediately.

Chapman had a large hand in the creation of Monty Python, the British comedy troupe that put on several seasons of its wonderfully irreverent TV show, Monty Python's Flying Circus, as well as several classic movies and many group albums. He met John Cleese at Cambridge, and the two brought together Terry Jones, Eric Idle and Michael Palin, as well as American animator Terry Gilliam in 1968.

ing that. Unluckily, three weeks before his death, Chapman had finished filming a Monty Python 20th anniversary special for cable TV, that will be shown later this year. Though John Cleese has said for years that there would most likely never be another Python film (the last was The Meaning of Life), Circus followers always held out hope that someday... Sadly, that will never come to pass.

But we can still remember. Like when Chapman, with a mischievous grin, showed us how to play the flute: "Just blow into this hole and move your fingers up and down." Or announcing a game of Olympic hide-and-seek. Or roughing up a Marxist peasant. Or closing down BBC because the skits are too silly. Or searching, in drag, for old pal Jean-Paul Sartre. Or having a romantic interlude interrupted by an enormous John Cleese and his shrieking harpy of a wife Terry Jones. And so on. The point is made.

Tuba Day: a new tradition?

by Tammie Smith

If the cheers from Saturday's football game against Trinity weren't enough to wake you from your sleep, perhaps the low, low sounds of tubas did, as the Williams College Mucho Macho Marching Band paid homage to the instrument.

You may not have guessed that it was Tuba Day, however, if you looked for tubas by the hundred. Although over eighty invitations were sent out to New England high schools and colleges, only one guest tuba player arrived.

Tuba Day was organized by Karl Galle '91, who got the idea from the University of Texas at Austin, where he took tuba lessons over the summer. Karen Jensen '91, helped Galle mail the invitations. By Friday, although Galle had not had any replies from the invitations, he said he was still optimistic.

"Tuba players seem to be odd enough that they will drive for long distances to be with others of their kind. They're sort of a rare breed, as it were," he said. Jensen said she was looking forward to the spectacle of the Purple Valley resonating with the the throbbing bass sounds of tuba.

"Tuba players never get a chance to play much in a hand sitting, so all people get to do is own 'em," Galle said. He said he planned to begin Saturday's events by conducting a tuba clinic. Galle said he was hoping that Saturday could be a sort of pep rally for tubists. The clinic, geared toward high school students, was to let young tubists "see the variety of things you can do with a tuba when you're not forced to accompany everyone else."

Galle said he has been playing the tuba since the sixth grade and is a card-carrying member of the Tubists International Brotherhood Association.

"You really have sort of easy job impressing people when you play the tuba. I would argue that it's the most versatile of the wind instruments because with that much mouth piece and that much horn to work with you've got just so much range. The types of sound can go from raunchy Wagnerian to a clear, mellow sound, and can get quite high," Galle said. "Being a tubist puts you very much in demand. Everybody wants a tuba."

The lone guest tuba was Don Peluse of Bennington, Vermont. Peluse is a member of the Legion Band and a community hand in Bennington. He said he learned about the event from an ad in the Bennington high school.

Peluse's tuba playing began over thirty-five years ago, with the same tuba, a risk-taking tuba, that he played at named "Big Bertha." Peluse said that both his father and grandfather were also tuba players.

Allison Fleig '93, a spectator, said, "I was disappointed and exhilarated at the same time." In a post-festival interview Jensen added, "Turnout was small this year, but in the years to come I hope Tuba Day will take its rightful place next to Mass MoCA and the Williamstown Theatre Festival in making Berkshire County the artistic center of the Universe."

Where can Morgan's Operations Management Program lead you?

At J.P. Morgan, career paths within Operations Management offer diverse challenges for the innovative problem solver. As an Operations professional, you could be asked to develop a marketing strategy, implement a quality control program, design a foreign exchange system, or manage a group of internal consultants.

That's why we look for graduates, regardless of academic specialty, with the potential to manage the people and systems that give us our competitive edge in world financial markets. And we begin to develop that potential by providing a unique management training program.

Our Operations Training program teaches the skills that will allow you to contribute quickly to Morgan's profitability and reputation for excellence. This program starts with an intensive, four-week session, drawing on the expertise of business school professors and

Morgan officers to give you a fundamental understanding of our role in the financial services industry. Training continues with on-the-job experience and additional classroom lectures designed to develop skills specifically related to your assignment.

This kind of commitment to helping you develop your managerial skills is consistent throughout your career at Morgan.

Please plan to attend our upcoming information session. Watch for time and location on campus. Or contact Paul Amoroso, Operations Recruiting, J.P. Morgan & Co., Incorporated, 23 Wall Street, New York, NY 10015

A national event

Ephs join marchers for more housing

of people hoping to meet Cher or Martin Sheen.

Cameras and club sandwiches I couldn't help but notice, too, as we were marching down the road from the Washington Monument towards the Capitol that crowds of people were sitting on the steps of buildings alongside the road eating sandwiches and watching the march as if it were a parade.

A lot of the marchers were carrying cameras. "Hey, go stand by that homeless man and I'll take your picture." Even the speakers at the grandstand did little to help. We had to leave before Jesse Jackson spoke.

But I realized at one point that I had been overlooking the words of the most important speakers. I had been overlooking the lyrics of the people who weren't there to perform. It took a homeless man sitting next to me to bring it all back into perspective.

"There's fifty thousand people here and you're asking me why I'm here?" he asked me.

The woman next to him said, "Maybe it's your button." A button on the old man's fatigue jacket read: "homeless veteran."

"Is it my button?" he asked me. "Sort of," I answered. "Well, then," he said, "I'm here 'cause of what the government is doing to thousands of people who served the country—stepping on them, that's what the hell they're doing to 'em."

The crowd chanted the day-long chorus: "What do we want? Housing! When do we want it? Now!"

"Real restructuring" One woman said she was there to make a "real statement about a restructuring of administrative priorities."

"What do we want? Housing! When do we want it? Now!"

One man's position was more radical. "Nothing short of a social revolution against [Donald] Trump and his class of people is going to solve the homeless problem."

Never mind that some of the celebrities here were probably as rich as Trump.

The man was a member of the Spartacist League, a Communist organization calling for the organization of a workers party, and far from alone in his radical view at the march. I came home with seven different socialist or communist newspapers.

"Outcasts, Downcasts, Slaves, Illegals and Rebels," declares a headline of the Revolutionary Worker, "It's Right to Rebel!"

"What do we want? Housing! When do we want it? Now!"

"I came because people need housing," said a woman of about sixty from Newark, NJ. "Because I'm a social worker I think

I should be here. Have you seen Mr. Kemp around here? People in Newark are paying $1500 per month..."

The woman standing next to her turned towards me and interjected, "per family." The first woman continued, "...for eight to ten people in a room. Three months ago I moved from an apartment 'cause I couldn't afford it. I live in a senior citizen building now, and I'd be on the street right now if I weren't a senior citizen."

Valerie Harper (who, by the way, quit her television show because NBC wouldn't pay her as much as they were paying Jason Bateman) was listing off the names of the two hundred celebrities who had come to the rally as they came up and sat on the stage. "John Stamos, Shadow Stevens, Christopher Reeve..."

"TV Later," chanted the crowd, "Housing Now!"

From underneath its sequin hood had poked the head of the march I'd been looking for.

Women's varsity crew wins bronze at Holyoke Regatta

by Asli Bali

Last Saturday, in the dark and chilling cold before daybreak, the Williams women's varsity, junior varsity and novice crew teams prepared to make the long trip up to South Hadley for their first race of the season.

The Mount Holyoke Invitational is traditionally the race with which the Ephs women start the fall season, and it sets the pace for subsequent races. This year Simmons, M.I.T., University of Massachusetts, Radcliffe, Mount Holyoke, and Williams were the six schools to participate in the races.

The morning started off early with the qualifying heats. The heats were the novice/fresh team's first racing experience, and the start was a little shaky. However, the three eight-person novice boats entered by Williams finished fourth, eighth, and tenth of sixteen boats, which put them in good standing for the afternoon's finals.

The JV eight, and the varsity four and eight qualified easily for their races. The morning heats motivated the Ephs women to concentrate and row much harder in the afternoon. The driving wind and unfamiliar course had made steering difficult for the coxswains and a winning effort would demand great determination in the afternoon.

Afternoon fireworks?

The novice boats were the first to race in the afternoon's finals. The Williams A-boat, with only four weeks of training, qualified for the grand final at the novice level and powered its way to third place, bringing the bronze home to Williams. The first and second place awards were both won by Radcliffe, whose novice squad is made up of experienced rowers who rowed at the high school level.

In the second novice heat, the Williams C-boat took third place after a slight accident, when their path was cut off by a Mt. Holyoke boat. The Mt. Holyoke boat was disqualified from the race, but the loss time had given the Simmons and M.I.T. boats the opportunity to take the lead. The Williams C-boat rowed hard and under control and showed its strength despite the obstacles it faced. The third fresh boat had experienced considerable difficulties in the morning's qualifying heat, but more than compensated with their afternoon's performance.

The Williams C-boat took third after an accident, when their path was cut off by a Holyoke boat formance. Powering out at the start, the Williams B-boat took the lead and increased it throughout the race, clocking their competition and winning easily. Their all-out effort brought Williams a plaque for first place in the third heat.

Further success

The spotlight next turned to the JV eight, which gave a strong showing, carrying them to second place behind Mt. Holyoke. The varsity four-person boat ran into some difficulties at the outset of its afternoon race. The coxswain, Bethany Moreton '92, tried to indicate that the boat was still being set (was still trying to maintain balance) when the start was called. However, the varsity four did compensate for its slow start by pulling forward and rowing hard throughout, ending in fourth place.

The final race was rowed by the varsity eight, which was coxed by team co-captain Megan Ouchterloney '90. The stroke (rower who sets the pace for the boat) was Cara McCandless '90, who won a gold medal in the Open 4 this past July at the Olympic Sports Festival in Oklahoma City. Six of the rowers in the varsity eight were seniors, including Joanna Lowell, team co-captain. The varsity eight is by far the most powerful force of the women's crew team, and their performance brought Williams third place and the bronze in the varsity finals, while Mt. Holyoke took first place and M.I.T. placed second.

Chris Cruz, coach of the women's varsity, had several comments before the races began. She said she expected the Williams women to place consistently in the top three of all their races, a prediction which the Ephs women certainly fulfilled. Coach Cruz did acknowledge that although last year's novice crew won the novice finals, it was made up largely of experienced rowers. This year's team has no experienced rowers, so Cruz and the novice coach, Molly Donovan, saw this race more as preparation for the coming races than as an opportunity to gain a first place win. However, the novice team did extremely well for its first race.

Coach Cruz also noted that the Williams varsity and JV had never taken first place at the Mount Holyoke Invitational. Although she did believe that the team had a good chance of winning, she saw this race largely as a good experience and training towards the most important race of the season, the Head of the Charles, scheduled for later this month. The bus ride back from South Hadley was a good deal more animated than the morning's ride up had been. Particularly among the freshmen there was a definite sense of excitement and accomplishment, as well as anticipation of the coming races. The Mount Holyoke Invitational was regarded all around as a positive way to start out the season.

WUFO competes at Division I Regionals

by Aaric Eisenstein

This past weekend men's WUFO traveled to Division I Regionals at UVM.

The men's spirits were high, as they wanted to avenge some of the close losses suffered the previous week.

The day started off well with a victory over Vermont Law School. Strong play early on gave WUFO a 7-5 lead at half time. Precision handling by seniors Guy Beade, Jay Hartley, and Jim Adams established the nucleus of the offense.

seemingly impenetrable zone defense forced one turnover after another, eventually allowing WUFO to close out the game 13-10.

Experience became the deciding factor in the next game against Home, a club team composed primarily of U. Mass/Amherst alumni. The game was a tightly contested battle throughout the long afternoon. WUFO edged close at a number of points, but just couldn't connect for the sustained effort to beat their older rivals.

WUFO's speed and agility caused one Home player to remark on Williams' ability to catch deflected passes in the end zone. Baird Jarman '92 and Dan Drener '90 did their part to break the spirits of Home with catches seemingly snatched from nowhere, but it just wasn't enough. WUFO lost 10-13.

The final game of the day was accompanied by the onset of darkness as Williams confronted their nemesis, UVM. The first half was the usual evenly-matched contest that characterizes play between WUFO and "Groovy" UV. At the half Williams trailed 7-5.

At this point rapidly falling light and exhaustion began to take their toll. With UV leading 9-8, a cap on the game was established at 11. This was the inspiration that WUFO needed. A burst of energy from Erik Sebesta '91, Matt Levin '90, and Mike Van Lent '91 propelled WUFO to first a tie at 9 apiece and then a lead at 10-9.

This was just too much for the home team to allow. Groovy turned on a terrific offensive effort, scoring two unanswered points to win. This was a heart-rending loss, characterized as "a hell of a fight" by WUFO members.

Brayton again had control of the set, leading the tiebreaker 5-1 when Burton surged back. The score was 5-4, when after a long series of ground strokes

Brayton forced up a short lob. Burton set up and proceeded to slam the easy overhead right into the net. It was all over for the Wesleyan woman, as Brayton went on to win the tiebreaker 8-6 and the next set 6-2.

Wednesday where Williams mugged the Panthers 8-1. Playing again at fourth seed, Brayton won the first set 6-2 and led the second set 4-0 when she allowed her opponent back in the match. The second set went on to a nerve-racking tiebreaker which Brayton finally won 10-8.

Coach Ramsey, who also works with Brayton on the women's squash team, said Brayton enjoys making her coach a little nervous.

"I think she likes to make me sweat it out," Ramsey said.

The rest of the Middlebury match went according to plan as Penny Foss '93 and Katherine Stearns '91 continued their undefeated singles seasons with victories at the number two and number three seeds respectively.

The pair were also successful in their number two doubles match, defeating the Middlebury team 6-3, 6-1. Foss and Stearns are also undefeated as a doubles team, excepting a default forced by injury during the Smith match.

Tough end of season
The road ahead looks rough for women's tennis. The Ephs must face strong Amherst and Skidmore teams after meeting a weaker Union squad on Thursday.

Skidmore is expected to be the best group the Ephs will face in the regular season and Saturday's match with Amherst should be, as always, a struggle. Ramsey is hopeful, however, that with a home court advantage and some strong fan support the Ephs will come out on top.

W. soccer loses to Bantams, beats RPI

by Kevin Greenberg

The scoring slump was over. The women's soccer team had scored twice in a 2-0 win over RPI last Tuesday, and then tallied a goal just two minutes into last Saturday's game with fourth-ranked Trinity. But the Ephs were not able to score again and the Bantams put two balls in the net, the first goals against freshman keeper Sara Treworgy in over four games, to defeat Williams 2-1.

"I think we had some lapses where we didn't play our hardest the whole game," said co-captain Jeanette Owen '90.

One of those lapses occurred 10:30 into the first half. Trinity had a restart right outside of the Ephs penalty box. The Bantams took the kick before Williams could get their defense set. The ball deflected off of Treworgy where an Eph unsuccessfully attempted to clear it. The Trinity center forward Cathy Innis then put the ball past Treworgy for a goal to tie the game.

Williams had taken the lead early in the game when Lynn Brenner '90 had scored. "We were charging forward and there was some confusion by Trinity. (Brenner) just stayed on towards the net and put it in from fairly close," said Coach Lisa Melendy. "She completely created the opportunity for herself."

But that one goal was not enough for the Ephs. Twenty-nine minutes into the second half the Bantams right wing hit a strong crossing pass to Innis, who scored.

The loss to Trinity ended the Ephs four-game winning streak; the last of the four wins was over RPI. Williams defeated the Engineers 2-0 in a game that they felt should have been more of a blowout.

"RPI was just pathetic. There was no threat at all. The wind was blowing so hard we were all just waiting around for the game to end," Owen said.

"Against the Engineers, Laura Anderson '92 and Missy Thaxton '93 both scored in the first 20 minutes of the game to spearhead the offensive attack and Treworgy had her fourth consecutive shutout to lead the defense.

But the most notable thing about this game is that it is the only time this season that the Ephs have scored more than one goal.

They will hopefully continue this scoring trend in their games against Union at home today and Amherst at home on Saturday.

Harriers dominate at Trinity

by Heather Smith

The men's and women's cross-country teams each captured another win Saturday in races at Trinity College in Hartford, Connecticut. The Williams women, led by Sue Donna '92, claimed second through 10th places and in a near sweep, won with 20 points. The men's team, placing six runners in the top 10, also won its race with 21 points.

At the start of the women's race, the team ran as a pack and strung out only slightly during the race. Together they kept a very even pace throughout the race so that the first and fifth scorers finished within 30 seconds of each other.

Coach Larry Bell gave the women's top runners a rest from competition this weekend in an effort to prepare them for next weekend's championship race, a luxury only teams with tremendous depth can afford. Even though the Ephs women left their top nine runners at home, the Williams second string, so to speak, moved into place and the competition could barely keep them in sight.

Completing the 3.1 mile course in 19:31, Donna placed second behind Trinity's Carrie Pike in a field of 32 runners. She was followed only two seconds later by captain Stacy Smith

'90 in third. Senior Ann Dannbauer and junior Eliza Dugundji raced to fourth and fifth place while sophomore Gwen Nagy finished the Eph scoring in sixth place. Freshman Deb Murphy, placing seventh, showed great improvement when she challenged the leaders early in the race. Soon after her, Katie Queney '92, Nikki Kimball '93, and Melissa Osborn ance, and depth, they are not a team that others should take lightly.

Men take first

The men's team, also competing with out many of its top runners, was victorious over squads from Trinity, RPI, and North Adams State. Marc Beitz '91 won

"It makes you a lot more motivated in practice if you know you're going to be tested the next weekend"

'93 placed 10th, 11th, and 12th respectively.

Captain Stacy Smith said, "some of our freshmen and people coming back to the sport had a chance to finish closer to the front [Saturday]... It makes you a lot more motivated in practice if you know you're going to be tested the next weekend."

"I thought they'd be a bit leg-weary, but the times were excellent today," Coach Bell said. After an eight-mile run up Mount Greylock on Tuesday and a tough speed workout on Wednesday, the Ephs had every reason to be tired at Trinity. With each race, however, the Ephs seem to prove more emphatically that with their speed, endurance, and depth, they are not a team that others should take lightly.

and claimed fourth place, only 11 seconds behind Johnson.

For several Williams competitors, Saturday was a remarkable day of personal bests. Williams fourth scorer this week, Brendan Kears '92, ran an outstanding race, placing sixth for his team and pegging a new personal record at 40 seconds faster than his previous one. Seth McLennan '93, Williams fifth man, at Kears's heels, placed seventh, crossing the finish line before Trinity's first man. In addition, Brian Moore '93 and senior Kevin Walter each slashed a minute from their personal bests.

"It was a great team performance... Without some key runners we knew we'd need our fourth through seventh men to do well and they did... [It was] the first meet this year with an intense attack from the start," Coach Farrell said of Saturday's race.

Next week both teams will meet several rival teams in Amherst at the New England Small College Association Championship (NESCAC). The Ephs women, defending their 1988 title, will face Bowdoin, which is presently ranked second in New England behind Williams. NESCAC is one of the two "big" championships on which both teams have set their sights during this season.

Volleyball downs Vassar, Springfield

by Rhonda Goodman

After suffering their first two losses of the season last week against Bates and Wellesley, the Ephs women had no trouble bouncing back to defeat Vassar and Springfield.

The first game of the match against Vassar was tight from beginning to end. Although they were down 0-2, and later down 9-13, the Ephs pulled together. Using the serving powers of juniors Laurie Hartsoc and Kathy McConnell, final kills by senior Shelley Welchman and overall team effort, Williams won the game 15-13.

"We had to work on our offense to make it difficult for them to return," senior co-captain Kris Johnson said of the team's strategy.

In the second game of the match, the Ephs overpowered their opponents, forcing the off balance Vassar team into making mistakes, blocking shots when necessary and jumping off to open the match at 4-0. Vassar ran out of gas; Williams came out on top - 15-7.

The evening of October 4 proved to be an unlucky one for the Springfield Indians. Both teams played hard, reaching an 8-6 tie at one point in the game. After an Elizabeth Johnson '93 service winner, a tremendous dink (tip) by Welchman, spikes from McConnell and Hartsoc and two final dinks from Welchman and Holly Hedeman '92, Williams gained control of the contest. The Ephs won, 15-8.

In the second game, despite a Williams 8-1 lead, there was heated contention for additional points. The Indians crumbled, however, under the constant pressure of the Ephs women. They won the game 15-4, taking the match as well.

"When we won the first game, we came out strong and confident for the next and they didn't have a chance to regain any momentum," Johnson said.

Tonight, the team says it hopes it can keep Union and North Adams from gaining an early momentum and directing the pace of the game.

"Our goal is to play as we normally do, no matter who we're playing," Johnson said.

most of those games should wind up with the Ephs on top. After Trinity regained the lead, Farley's offense stalled and Vaughan roared on the field to punt. After a poor performance the day before and a blocked effort earlier in the day, Vaughan had several reasons to worry, as he found himself standing at his own 20. But he nailed a 64-yard shot that was downed at the Bantam five, and that put Trinity in a tight spot. After Rogers and Dan Newhall '91 made a pair of nice tackles, the teams traded punts, with the Ephs finally regaining possession at their own 37 and just over two minutes to play.

Fifty-eight. And, finally, the Eph of fense clicked. After Dwyer hit senior Lars Hem with a couple of bullets, Moynahan made an incredible twisting, one-handed catch that left the Ephs at the Bantam six. Hem capped the drive two plays later, as he rumbled in after hauling in a four-yard toss with only fifty-eight seconds remaining. The Eph offensive unit stayed on the field for the conversion, as Farley figured "it's not like we're going to a bowl game," but Dwyer, rolling left, was met by a wall of Bantams that stopped him short of the goal line and left the Ephs behind by one. 1967. Trinity coach Miller has been at their own 45 with under a minute left. Two receptions by Vaughan carried Farley's troops to the Bantam 25, and a sack and an incomplete pass left Dwyer facing a third-and-16. With thirteen ticks left, he took a long look downfield and then launched a spiral to Moynahan, who walked into the Trinity end zone from the six. Although the two-point conversion failed, Trinity could only return the kickoff to their 46 and, on the last play of the game, Rogers stormed through the Bantam line to dump Levine and extinguish any possibilities of a Trinity score.

"I can't remember losing a game on an inside kick [since 1967]"

Five. The win leaves the Eph squad with an unblemished 3-0 record, and serves as revenge for last year's only defeat, a 24-20 setback at Trinity. Having previously downed powerful Hamilton and dangerous Tufts, the Ephs have completed the toughest part of their schedule as they prepare for next week's trip to Bates. In any case, Saturday's contest represented football at its finest and, as Farley noted, "for anyone who paid their way in, they've got no complaints."

Trinity played much stronger soccer at the start of the second half, and they got back into the game with a goal less than 10 minutes into the half. With the lead reduced to one, the Eph defense tightened up in front of goalkeeper Chuck Goldfarb '92, and the Bantam offense was effectively shut down.

"They came at us a little after their first goal, but when we scored again the

by Jeff Merritt

Some things are inevitable: a trip to the dentist, flunking at the end of a meal in Baxter, the end of a winning streak. So the Williams men's soccer team took it in stride when its modest 11-game winning streak, spanning parts of the past two seasons, ended on the road last Wednesday in a 1-0 overtime loss to the Division II Springfield Indians. The team rebounded quickly, though, improving its record to 6-1 with a 3-1 victory over the previously undefeated Trinity Bantams on Saturday.

The game against Trinity was the fourth consecutive road game for the Ephs, and they had only managed three goals in the previous three games. So Coach Russo altered the offensive alignment a little, pushing an extra forward up the field in an effort to help the Williams attack. "It wasn't panic because of the loss," senior captain Dan Calichman explained, "but the plan worked and the offense really looked great."

The Williams offense generated two goals against the Bantams before the game was 17 minutes old. The first of these came off the foot of Sam McIlwain '90, giving the midfielder his first goal of the season. Less than seven minutes into the game, McIlwain trapped a loose ball with his chest in the penalty box and quickly put it into the net. Just 10 minutes later, Ambi Stern '90 sent an acrossing pass to a wide open Rob Lake '91 at the side of the net. Lake easily scored his team-leading seventh goal of the season, giving the Ephs a 2-0 lead. Williams dominated the entire half, but could not score again.

Trinity played much stronger soccer at the start of the second half, and they got back into the game with a goal less than 10 minutes into the half. With the lead reduced to one, the Eph defense tightened up in front of goalkeeper Chuck Goldfarb '92, and the Bantam offense was effectively shut down.

"They came at us a little after their first goal, but when we scored again the game was out of reach," Calichman said. Steve Bailey '91 scored the insurance goal, making the score 3-1 with only 11 minutes left in the game. The goal was the second of the season for the junior fullback.

The Bantams managed only four shots in the game, and their first loss of the season dropped their record to 2-1-2. The Ephs took 10 shots on the day in front of Goldfarb, and the goalkeeper picked up his fourth win of the season.

Overtime loss

Williams and Springfield battled through 90 minutes of regulation time under the lights at Springfield without a goal being scored. The game was a defensive struggle, and neither squad had too many good scoring chances.

With 20 seconds remaining in the first overtime, Shawn Perkins scored a goal for the Indians, beating goalkeeper Bill Hennig '93 with a header into the upper corner of the net. "It was a failure on our part to get to the ball and clear it," Stern said. The ball had been played into the penalty box from midfield, and Perkins reached it ahead of the Eph defense.

The teams played a second 15-minute overtime, but Williams could not tie the score. The Ephs had not been held scoreless since a game against Bowdoin in 1986, an impressive streak spanning 48 consecutive games. The offensive success that Williams has had in the past, though, seems to affect the way that their opponents approach the game.

"Because of our reputation, teams come out and concentrate on playing really tough defense against us, and it's very hard for us to create goal-scoring opportunities," Coach Russo said. "They mark us very tightly, and forego their offense a little, hoping to counterattack."

"The loss was bound to happen," Stern said. "You can't win every game, and this means that we just have to work that much harder." The team's work ethic will certainly be tested when the Ephs travel tomorrow to the University of Massachusetts, Russo's alma mater. The Ephs finally return to Cole Field for a game against the Bowdoin Polar Bears on Saturday.

"We hope to upset [Salem State]. We've lost to them once by only four strokes and we've got a chance if we could play some solid golf," Seguin said concerning the challenge.

Sailing second at Corinthian

by Jenny Austin

The Williams College Sailing Club posted its record best finish with a second weekend in the 19th annual Corinthian Intercollegiate Regatta.

The event, sponsored by the Corinthian Cruising Club and hosted this year by the Larchmont Yacht Club, featured crews from 24 schools from New York and New England for two days of racing on Long Island Sound. Boats ranged in length from 24 to 44 feet and were provided by Corinthian member Geoff Wadsworth.

Saturday's race started with a brisk northeast breeze of 10-15 knots. Skipper Ned Bicks was able to maneuver Spruce into fourth place around the windward mark behind RPI, Vassar and Penn State. With winds dying later in the day, the Williams' boat - skippered by Ned Bicks '91, and crewed by Damon Hemmerling '93, Phil Power '92, Dan Silverman '92, Shelley Torgerson '92, Marc Klaus '91, and Andy Saunders '90 - was Spruce, a Tartan 30 loaned by Corinthian member Geoff Wadsworth.

Sunday's race saw a discouraging start for Williams, followed by a tactical error which left the team out of wind. Rounding the weather mark, the Williams found itself in the back of the fleet. Despite lights winds of 8-10 knots, Williams managed to slowly pass several boats during the remainder of the triangular course to cross the line sixth. After applying the time handicaps, RPI was first, followed by UVM, Vassar Maritime, and Williams in fourth.

Based on the finishes from both days of racing, RPI won Class II with 1.5 points, Williams claimed second with 7, and Vassar rounded out the top three with 9. Williams' previous best was a third overall by Geoff O'Connell '91 in the 1987 Corinthians.

Class I, which featured boats of larger and faster designs, saw US Coast Guard take first overall, followed by Merchant Marine Academy and US Navy.

Eph golf hands AIC, Springfield defeat at Taconic

by Augusto Torres

Last Saturday the Williams men's golf team readily handled their opponents from Springfield College and American International College (AIC) at the Taconic Golf Course.

In this three-team competition each player is pitted against players from the other schools. The lowest scorer for each hole wins that hole. One point is awarded to the winner of each hole and half a point for each tie. After the round is over, the player with the most points wins and contributes one point to the team's overall score. Seven players play for each team. The Ephs beat Springfield 6 1/2 to 1/2 and AIC 6-1. Five Ephs won, one tied, and one lost.

Junior captain Sean Seguin was happy with the team's performance and commented that "Rusty Field '90 and Rob Abel '91 provided depth in the sixth and seventh spots. As long as we played up our potential we expected to win. It was kind of a tuneup for this week's New England's."

The team is playing today and tomorrow in their final and biggest event of this fall season, the New England's held in Cape Cod. Teams from all three divisions are competing. Salem State is the odds-on favorite in Division III.

"We hope to upset [Salem State]. We've lost to them once by only four strokes and we've got a chance if we could play some solid golf," Seguin said concerning the challenge.

"Food!"

WRFC hosts Holy Cross, Dartmouth

by Chris Blackburn

This weekend saw the return of the W.R.F.C. to the Valley, and Saturday provided great weather and great rugby as Williams, Holy Cross, and two sides from Dartmouth whiled away a fine afternoon on Cole Field.

In the A-side match, Williams faced undefeated Holy Cross, a club that two years ago finished second in New England, and one that this year is determined to go all the way. Accordingly, their play was quite intense from the opening kick-off, and while the White Dogs were still rubbing sleep from their eyes the Crusaders scored two quick tries.

Late in the first half, Williams threatened repeatedly, getting to within inches of the line more than once, but the Crusaders displayed great defense as well, holding back the Dogs for the remainder of the half.

With the half, Williams switched sides of the pitch, and were now playing into the face of the wind, a zephyr from the west that carried news of the A-side's doom. Tries for Holy Cross began to roll in as well, despite valiant play by the outsized Williams side. The play of the Crusader scrum was epitomized by that of their loose head prop, kicked out of the match late in the half by the referee for unrepentant dangerous, dirty play.

Williams refuses to crumble
As the second half (and Holy Cross) rolled on, Williams suddenly had one of the sustained flashes of frothy, brilliant rugby that, when it comes, is daunting to witness. Charging running by the backs, notably senior Chap Peterson, who scored a try and made a number of strong runs and accurate kicks, moved the ball into the Holy Cross end despite the wind. Chap's try was augmented by Matt Conlan '91 who, peeling to the weak side off of a scrumdown, saw a huge gap in the Crusader defense, and raced to the corner for the try. These scores, though brilliant, were too little, too late, and, after senior Dan Foote's penalty kick, the final tally showed Williams to be on the wrong side of a 28-11 score.

The B-side walked onto the pitch having seen the precision work of the Holy Cross club, and were well aware that their best game would be required to redeem the pride of the W.R.F.C. These fifteen fellows proved themselves a better side than the one that had lost to Dartmouth the week before, and crushed the Crusaders 20-3. The match was marked by great running, kicking and passing by the backs, and the experienced (6 of the 8 are seniors) B-side scrum showed an uncanny ability to come away with the second phase ball.

Meanwhile, on the second pitch, the C-side took on old rivals Dartmouth, who were still sore from the tense, 6-0 loss they suffered in Hanover last week. This time, a different setting had the same fate in store. As John Hobbs '91 broke five tackles to score a try that would seal the score at Williams 9, Dartmouth 0, the club had a fine moment. For, at that very instant, sophomore Jim Kaufman was touching down the B-side's final try.

The team's future encountered a blow in the final match of the day, as the fourth side lost to Dartmouth in a well-played match. The post-game festivities revealed that Holy Cross is a fine rugby club off the field as well, and it was with true regret that we sang them farewell, quarters for tolls clinking in their pockets.

Next week, Cole Field will be the site of another rugby extravaganza, as Norwich will hop on Route 91 to face some very hungry White Dogs.

Women's tennis team loses to Trinity in a close match

by Dan Silverman

After a long and tiring road stand featuring blowouts over Mount Holyoke, Middlebury and Wesleyan, Williams women's tennis stumbled and lost to Trinity in a heartbreaker, 5-4.

The Ephs were, naturally, confident going into Saturday's Trinity match at Hartford with a 7-1 record and five wins in a row, but they knew they would face a difficult test.

"Trinity will be a very tough match. We'll have to play especially well," Eph coach Gail Ramsay said the day before the match.

Indeed, Williams did play well and the match score was tied at 4-4 going into the final number-one doubles match.

The Eph's team of captain Amy Davidson '90 and Beth Laxson '91 was defeated by an excellent Trinity pair, Bo Hewitt and Heather Watkins, in straight sets 6-2, 6-1.

Williams' previous two devastating weeks of road games, however, overshadowed the Trinity loss.

Beginning at Mount Holyoke on September 26, Williams crushed their opponents 9-0, losing only two sets in all singles and doubles play. The best match was turned in by Laxson at the number five singles slot, as she beat Holyoke's Shelly Bogaru 6-4, 3-6, 6-3.

"This was [Beth Laxson's] best win of the year," Coach Ramsay said.

Williams' next victims were the Wesleyan Cardinals. The Cards were only able to chip out two victories from nine matches with the Ephs.

Williams had no trouble with the Cardinal's first three singles seeds. The Ephs dropped a mere six games during the three matches. The fourth seeded match was, however, a bit more suspenseful.

Brayton makes things interesting

The Eph's Lisa Brayton '91 faced Wesleyan's Beisy Burton. In the first set, Brayton was in command at 5-2 when things became more interesting. Burton broke back and back again to bring the score to 6-5 in her favor. Brayton held serve to make it 6-all and brought

Field hockey team upsets Bantams, posts three consecutive shutouts

by Mariam Naficy

In an upset game last Saturday, the women's field hockey team crushed Trinity 5-0, building on consecutive wins against Middlebury and Wesleyan. The Trinity defeat was especially sought-after, since the Bantams are considered a strong team.

The Ephs dominated from the very beginning of Saturday's away game. Their aggressive offense pushed into Trinity territory early, with Judy Fleishman '90 scoring the first goal of the game 4:20 into the first half. The game went scoreless until a second attack eight minutes later proved fruitful, as Amy Kershaw '90 scored a second goal. This left the Bantams on the short end of a 2-0 score at the end of the half.

Good passing and strong defense enabled the Ephs to keep Trinity out of their end of the field and on the run during the second half. After seven dry minutes of play, Laurie Burnett '91 assisted Julie Carroll '91 to the Ephs' third goal. Burnett entered the scoring picture again four minutes later, this time to tally the Ephs' fourth goal of the game. Finally, Amy Honigfeld '91 assisted Ashley Edgar '92 to the fifth and last goal of the game 34:50 into the second half.

When the dust settled, the stats were clear: Williams dominated. The Ephs outshot Trinity by an impressive 20-1 margin.

The JV field hockey team performed well, too, shutting out Trinity 2-0 the same day.

Middlebury, Wesleyan fall

Last Wednesday the Ephs traveled to Vermont to face the Middlebury Panthers. They came out with another, 3-0 shutout. The score is deceiving, however, as Middlebury proved to be a strong team, aggressive through the midfield. Each side held the other scoreless for the entire first half and for most of the second, until Mika Wood '93 assisted Chen Stites '92 to the first goal of the game, 17:30 into the second half. Once the scoring started, Williams dominated the rest of the game: goals by Kristin Frederickson '90 and co-captain Mo Flaherty '90 (assisted by Kershaw) followed.

Williams outshot Middlebury 13-4, with goalie Tracy Davis '91 making hard saves on all four Panther attempts.

On September 30, the team overcame one obstacle on its way to a Little Three title: it traveled to Wesleyan and came back with a tremendous 6-0 win. The team's depth was made clear in the number of players who scored: co-captain Beth McNulty '90, Kershaw, and Stites put in one goal each, while Flaherty and Honigfeld tallied two each.

Once again, the Ephs outshot their opponents, this time 14-4. Goalie responsibilities were split between Davis, who played the first 3/4 of the game, and Stacy Minyard '90, who played the rest of the game.

The team returns home to face Union this Thursday and, in the determining game of the Little Three Championship, Amherst on Saturday.

All right, let's face it. No sense in beating around the bush. You should have been there. You should have gone to the game. And, no, reading an article is not going to be the same as standing in the bleachers in Weston Field during the incredible fourth quarter of Saturday's 26-21 football triumph over Trinity. But, just in case you did miss the game and you still haven't heard what happened, let's take a look at some of the important numbers from the game, which left the Eph squad with a perfect 3-0 mark.

Fourteen. Fourteen is the number of punts that Trinity put on the board before the crowd had a chance to settle in their seats. An opening drive that combined some tight run-outs and hook patterns with consistently strong sweeps put the Ephs in a hole early. A 6-yard touchdown dart from quarterback Todd Levine to Terry McNamara following a blocked punt that left the Bantams deep in Eph territory widened the gap to 14-0. Eph coach Dick Farley saw the 14 points as a problem that could be remedied, as he noted that Trinity coach Don Miller "came out with an unbalanced formation we'd never seen before. We had some problems with inexperienced line-backers and a free safety, and it took a little while for them to adjust to it."

Not much to cheer about

Eighty-nine. While the Bantams were moving the ball up and down the field at will, the Eph defense sputtered through the first two stanzas, managing only 89 yards. Despite the rather lethargic offense, however, the men in purple did manage a few scoring chances, driving deep into Bantam turf on two occasions on the strength of some nifty running by quarterback Dan Dwyer '92, a lucky facemask call, and an interception by Brian Tapich '92 that left the Ephmen at the Trinity two.

Both of these chances left the Ephmen singing the blues, however, as Trinity cornerback John Dauphinee picked off a Dwyer toss in the end zone to thwart one drive, and a valiant, four-down goal-line stand by the Trinity defense corps held the score at 14-0 as the first half came to a close. Dwyer shouldered the blame for the goose egg, maintaining that he "played like crap in the first half," but a fiery, oversized Bantam line was also to blame.

Sixty-two. Sixty-two is the number on junior defensive end Ted Rogers' jersey. It's also the number Trinity coaches and linemen will remember with fear for a long time, as Rogers was all over the gridiron, making big play after big play. Rogers pounced on a blocked punt with 7:03 remaining in the third quarter to yard boot by Lindsey Vaughan '92, and an interception by David Week '92, the Ephmen engineered a 10-play, 44-yard drive that culminated with a three-yard scoring shot from Dwyer to Moynahan and knotted the score at 14 apiece. Trinity responded with a strong drive of their own, driving 62 yards off the ensuing kickoff to take the lead once more with 10:41 remaining on a three-yard pass from Levine to halfback Steve Redgate. The touchdown, which represented the Bantams' first points since the first quarter, finally wake up the snoozing scoreboard operator and bring the Ephmen within a touchdown. Rogers, who also pitched in with some fireworks at the end of the game, thus brought his season scoring total to 14 points, and prompted teammate Matt Moynahan '92 to say, "He's just a man on a mission this year. He's incredible."

Ten. After another blocked punt, a 30-took some of the wind out of the Eph comeback sails, and led Farley to later observe that the Trinity TD "was probably the most disappointing part of the game for me."

Twenty-one. That's how many games this year's sophomores have left in purple jerseys and pads. And, in view of the way the sophomores asserted themselves in the final stanza of Saturday's duel, Williams College. A small liberal arts college tucked cozily away in the picturesque mountains of New England.

And an institution with 1989-90 projected total expenditures over the $60 million mark, an endowment of $325 million invested largely in the stock market, and property holdings that include the 450-acre main campus, most sections of Spring Street, and the 2,500 acres of Hopkins Memorial Forest.

How does this little college deal with the business world into which it has plunged? The answer is a constantly expanding administration, increasingly regulated procedures, and a reliance on outside lawyers and financial managers that Ephraim Williams probably never dreamed would be necessary for his "free school."

The Insider looks at many of the financial components that enabled Professor Gordon Winston to design a course on "College as an Economic Activity": tuition, financial aid, the endowment, faculty salaries and liability. The centerfold examines the financial future of the college with a focus on the five-year, $150 million Third Century Campaign kicking off this week in New York City.

Finally, a piece on the parallels between Williams and a business or corporation suggests reasons why the Justice Department may feel confident in applying laws like the Sherman Antitrust Act to colleges, and hints that Williams may be entering a new era of big business, like it or not.

Faster than the speed of inflation

Tuition climbs 54 percent in five years

by Sara Dubow and Ellen Drought
"What Williams is selling is a product: a year of Williams College education. It costs $40,000 a year to produce that product, but the maximum price anybody pays for that year at Williams is $19,000."

In contrast to the oft-heard complaints about the rising cost of Williams' tuition, Provost of the College Gordon Winston says that students are actually getting a bargain.

Still, Williams' tuition has gone up markedly. A student entering Williams five years ago would have paid $9,200 in tuition costs. The total costs for the year came to $12,454. Today, a student pays $14,195 in tuition for a total of $18,995. In other words, this year's tuition is 154 percent of what it was five years ago. And the total cost has gone up by about 53 percent.

"Like most other schools, Williams' tuition tends to increase by two to three percent more than inflation," Vice President and Treasurer of the College Will Reed said.

The question Williams students and parents have been asking over the past few years is why.

Larger share of costs

One reason for the increase is that over the past 20 years, students have paid a growing percentage of the total costs of one year at Williams. This change is bound up in the history of the college.

"In the late 1950's and early 1960's tuition covered about 50 percent," Reed said. "But when Williams went coeducational, the endowment per student decreased because the student body had doubled while the endowment had not."

The switch to coeducation was followed by what Winston termed "an academic depression" in the late 1960s and 1970s. "We went into the 1980s with a very powerful, long list of things to catch up on. For instance, faculty salaries fell by 20 percent between 1968 and 1980. And that was a time when salaries in other occupations were not doing badly at all.

"So...Williams started in 1980 by saying that we must bring faculty salaries back up simply to the level of 1968," Winston continued. "That was an important part of the explanation for rising costs."

Another reason for skyrocketing tuition prices is also tied in with the financial difficulties of a decade ago. "We built very few buildings in that 14 years. We had very little expansion of of newly established programs adding to the cost of a Williams education.

Given that a year at Williams cost $40,000 and students are responsible for $19,000, what makes up the difference?

"Tuition covers approximately 60 percent of the cost of a Williams education. The rest comes from earnings from the [$325 million] endowment and gifts," Reed said.

The process of coming up with an actual tuition figure is somewhat subjective, according to Reed.

"We start with a current base, and ask departments for budgets. We get an astronomical number. We then have to pare it back and ask where the income will come from: how much will come from the endowment, gifts and tuition. Then we use our judgment to come up with a figure."

'The mixed signal is that politically, people are furious about the prices they pay, but they sure as hell don't send their kids to SUNY-Albany.'

Once a figure has been arrived at, its effect on the students is the last variable. "Students who are admitted to Williams and choose not to come usually go on to higher priced schools," Reed said. "What we don't know is how many don't even apply because of the sticker price."

He explained that often students and their parents experience "sticker shock," meaning that they look at the price and immediately reject it as too high, even though the college has programs," Winston said. "So we've had a number of things that we're catching up on after a long dry period."

The Reagan world

"There was a very strong competitive pressure in the 80s to increase services, to give our customers more services than we'd been giving them in the past. A lot of that kind of thing was going on in a world where everybody was going upscale...You don't have a full appreciation of just what the Reagan world did to us."

Reed cited the recent addition of Chinese and Japanese programs, the new non-Western divisional requirement and tutorials as examples need-based financial aid. Winston, however, discounted sticker-shock as something the college should not be worried about.

"The mixed signal is that politically, people are furious about the prices they pay, but they sure as hell don't send their kids to SUNY-Albany."

Another issue is whether Williams can and will continue to raise its tuition at the rates of the last few years and still attract the student body it wants.

When it all comes down to it, the demand is there. But since much of that demand is from students who will drive down the school's academic reputation, Williams can't accept them with impunity.

Professor of Economics Michael McPherson, who has taught a course at Williams on the economics of higher education, said that tuition will not rise to a crisis point for two reasons: "First, the economy will run into a recession. It's inevitable, and it's going to make it harder to raise prices.

Cutting the frills

"Second, we will reach a point where some schools will say that they've cut out the frills to advertise a lower price. It's what Japanese cars did to the American auto industry."

However, members of the administration communicated a feeling of urgency about the need to slow down tuition increases. "We have to moderate," Reed maintained. "We have to be less ambitious with new programs. We have to tighten up on staff."

"It depends on what people ask of us," Winston said. "I think we're really getting a message that even if it means reducing the growth of quality, we better figure out methods of slowing [tuition increases] down."

Figures from College Board Survey of 1989-90 tuition and required fees for freshmen.

Opinion Students should speak out

by Peter Balaban and Lee Mickus

It has taken an investigation by the Justice Department to put the issue of how colleges like Williams set financial aid and tuition under public scrutiny. Whether or not intercollegiate collusion is taking place, tuition and fees at Williams are too high.

Since the senior class entered as freshmen, the cost of attending Williams has jumped by over 30 percent. Five years ago, the total cost of a year at Williams was $12,454. This year it costs $18,995. This is how much it costs to feed an average family of four for a year. The difference between what the price was and what it is could pay for a year at some respected state universities.

It's obscene and embarrassing that we have to pay this much for an undergraduate education. Moreover, the administration has provided students and their parents with only the most general and dubious of explanations as to why these increases have been necessary.

Mostly, in justifying these increases, the administration talks about the need to pay for curricular changes and to keep faculty salaries competitive. These seem like reasonable arguments because they deal with issues that are crucial to students' education. But President Oakley says much less about the need to pay for changes that have occurred in the physical plant over the past few years. Projects like revamping the Williams College Museum of Art and Hopkins Hall cost millions of dollars, and students end up absorbing the cost in their term bills.

Flashy projects

The administration's standard rationalization that these projects are funded by the endowment is evasive and misleading. By squandering endowment money instead of applying it directly to the college's necessary expenditures like salary boosts for faculty and staff, the administration is forced to rely on tuition hikes to take up the slack. It would be wiser to use our generous endowment to keep costs down rather than to finance flashy projects.

The administration can get away with what it does, unfortunately, because students and their parents passively accept the increases and apparently assume that the administration knows how to best spend their money. College Treasurer William Reed recently said that he could count on one hand the number of letters he had received from people complaining about the last increase. This is a sad state of affairs.

Students and parents seem to assume that once they make the decision to enter Williams

Williams, Inc.?

by Robert Weisberg

What kind of business would sell its product at half of its true cost to a group of customers selected from many thousands willing to pay twice its market value?

On the other hand, what kind of non-business would amass funds of over $300 million, compete violently with its peers for limited resources and get hit with a federal antitrust investigation?

Has Williams College become a true business? For where once a small mom-and-pop institution stood, there is now a multi-million dollar organization capable of attracting and spending huge amounts of money.

"It's very true. Williams has become a lot more complicated and a lot less casual in its management," Provost Gordon Winston said. Changes have been made in the way even small schools like Williams look at themselves, he added, because of different expectations and standards in society.

"Williams does feel a greater responsibility and urgency to try to get the most out of its resources," said Professor of Economics Michael McPherson, who has taught a class on higher education as a business activity in the past. "That's reflected in fundraising, investing the endowment, finding the right tuition."

Personnel review

Winston cited the tenure process as an example of a college procedure that has changed to keep up with the times. "When I came to Williams, I didn't know I was being considered for tenure...I was called into the chairman's office and told the decision had been made that I had tenure.

"In 1965, there was nothing elaborate about it. The chairman and the president may have had a long talk and said, 'What the hell, give Winston tenure.'

"Now, because of legal action and because of a very strong desire to be fair to people, we have elaborate procedures for granting tenure," he said. This is a result of "a genuine desire of the institution not to be as potentially capricious as when it was a mom-and-pop operation, because mom and pop may be great people, but they may be very unfair.

"Now we've got records that are very carefully kept, that we know are likely to be subjected to legal scrutiny by a judge coming in and asking questions about our tenure decisions -- mom and pop never thought of that."

The new tenure system parallels the increasingly regimented personnel review procedures seen in private industry, as businesses attempt to shield themselves from claims of discrimination by employees.

Financial aid is another aspect of the college becoming increasingly complex and regulated.

"Thirty years ago, mom and pop could simply hand some money to some nice kid (not woman, notice)," Winston said. "We now follow a very elaborate congressional methodology. We have no choice."

Yet he maintained that the end result is a system that is much fairer. It may be more agonizing for those who go through it, but it is also more legally defensible.

The more business-like demeanor at Williams is also reflected in the growing size of the administration. The phenomenon is analogous to the complex management hierarchies at the top of large corporations.

"The administration has grown," said Winston. "To run a more complicated institution, you need a bigger administration.

An example Winston cited was the development office, which will run the five-year Third Century Fund Drive that kicks off this week.

"That's been one of the major areas of growth. Fifteen years ago they were a sleepy little office; now they're a big office, on the order of 40 people. But their very costly and people-intensive efforts are going to bring the college $150 million.

A good explosion

"Should we do it? Should we let the administration 'explode,' if the outcome is $150 million?" Winston continued. "The economist in me looks at that and sees the benefits of that activity dramatically outweighing the cost."

He said that for every dollar the college brings in through development projects, it spends approximately twelve cents.

So while "lean and mean" may be a great rallying cry, Williams has discovered that cutting costs and personnel is not always as possible -- or even as desirable -- as it may seem.

"As long as the idea of 'cutting administration costs' stays at the bumper sticker level, it's easy to say, 'The administration is growing out of control!'" Winston said. "But if you go under that and see where the money is really spent, I don't think there would be a lot of argument with what we're doing and why we're doing it, especially...with legal governmental and competitive elements pushing hard on Williams."

A staff of cost-cutters

To slow down the rapid increase in administrative personnel will take more than a simple moratorium on staff growth, because the most crucial thing in reducing costs is a staff of cost-cutters.

"To do a good job of tightening up the budget takes more people; we couldn't do it without them," Winston said. "What worries me is that unless we get bigger, unless we have more resources devoted to running ourselves, we won't know what we're doing, what we're spending. [Yet] I'm afraid we're more unwieldy now than we should be."

It seems that the Justice Department has noticed all of these parallels between Williams and business corporations. Its antitrust investigation into Williams and over 20 other colleges and universities begun over the summer has increased in scope to include 55 schools and still remains a mystery. Federal officials will not say what has prompted the inquiry, which is examining the determination of three budget components: financial aid, tuition and salaries of administration and faculty.

While no Williams officials will speculate as to what is behind the investigation, part of the reason may be the issue of higher education and the free market. The fact that the inquiry is being conducted under the auspices of the Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890 -- a law most famous for its trustbusting history -- confirms that colleges may be dragged kicking and screaming into the world of big business.

The investigation has already had legal ramifications for Williams. A class-action lawsuit filed by a Wesleyan student claims financial aid and tuition collusion on the part of the Little Three, the Ivy League and Stanford University.

But does all this truly put Williams College in the same category as General Motors? While Williams has shown some of the attributes of a growing business, Winston sees one crucial distinction.

"We're selling a $40,000 education for $19,000," he said. "It's like selling BMWs only to people who are really good drivers. And everybody outside is willing to pay $50,000 to get their kids into Williams."

"In setting our price, we know we're not covering costs," McPherson said. "We're not maximizing revenue." He agreed with Winston that any business that sold its good for less than its cost would be crazy.

"If we simply auctioned it off, which is what could happen, [faculty and administrators] at Williams would be driving nicer cars. But that's not what it's about."

Returning gifts

Another difference is the school's policy on accepting monetary gifts. McPherson said that in the past the school has returned alumni donations with conditions that were unacceptable to the college. "A business certainly wouldn't do that."

Williams is exceptional among "businesses" in that it faces a tremendous and highly lucrative demand. However, every business also has to make sure that its prices don't drive away its customers. How does Williams react to a growing public outcry against tuition increases that consistently outpace inflation?

"We're very worried about a public backlash," Winston said. "Yet it's strange, in that we have people lining up 4,000 deep to buy the product at the current prices, and then these people are making a political issue about the price."

What worries both Winston and McPherson is that competition and other pressures will force Williams to abandon its principles.

"It would worry me if Williams came to feel so dependent on succeeding [in a business sense] that it lost its internal bearings on what's important," McPherson said.

"The school is getting pressure from alumni donations with strings, students demanding things that aren't necessarily associated with their education," he continued. "The president and others need to take a hard look at what's important to education."

Investigation may mean end of need-blind admissions at Overlap Group institutions

by Stephanie Jones

Williams and Amherst may soon extend their rivalry in a new direction, by seeing who can offer outstanding prospectives the most money to attend their school. At least this is the speculation of some, who say that government interference into traditional financial aid policies could unleash a bidding war between schools.

The college received a letter from the U.S. Justice Department on July 31 announcing an investigation into the financial practices of the school. The probe was at first limited to perhaps 14 colleges and universities, but has since mushroomed to include over 50 institutions.

The investigation has three foci: financial aid, tuition and faculty salaries. Many have speculated that the government's attention was attracted by the Overlap Group, an organization of 23 colleges, including the Little Three and the Ivy League, which began meeting to discuss financial aid offers to common candidates over 30 years ago.

"The thing that impresses me is the way that the massive financial aid system works," Provost Gordon Winston said. "I think it's absolutely stunning that we have evolved a social mechanism that can do that, and that's why it's terrifying to see the government screw around with it, because they can really mess it up, and I have a sneaking suspicion that's just what they're doing."

According to members of Overlap, the colleges have already determined their financial aid offers before meeting. The group claims it merely attempts to make sure that students receive fair amounts of aid and do not have to choose a school for financial reasons.

"Williams College alone determines its own tuition and its own financial aid awards; the College is party to no unlawful agreement," President Francis Oakley said in a September 20 all-campus mailing.

According to a brochure published by the college, 35 percent of the classes of 1989 through 1992 receive aid from Williams. The average package, which includes scholarship, a job, and loans, is $11,300.

David Markowitz, the director of public affairs at the American Council on Education, said that people should not assume that the investigation will cause the Overlap Group to be disbanded. "What you've got now is simply a civil investigation."

"We're not going to know anything until this investigation runs further than it has. Now we are operating under the assumption that nothing will change, but that assumption could change tomorrow, it could change a month from now," Don Saleh, the director of financial aid at Cornell University, said.

Merit-based aid?

Some have speculated, however, that if the group was abolished, dramatic changes in financial aid policy would occur. These could include the abandonment of need-blind admissions and the institution of merit-based aid. Such a system could conceivably result in a bidding war for the best students, which would in turn drive up tuition.

"The alternative to this is really scary," said a former Williams official, who was interviewed by Robert Weisberg for the Advocate and asked not to be identified. "Schools would be trying to attract the brightest students...It would be just like athletics. Admissions people are under a lot of pressure by administration and faculty to recruit the very best."

'Schools would be trying to attract the brightest students. It would be just like athletics.'

students should pay," said Richard Mersereau, the director of public relations at Bowdoin College. "There's no clear indication that if Overlap stopped the financial aid budget would necessarily rise."

"I don't buy that speculation [about a bidding war]," Saleh said. "I think there's a fundamental commitment to need-based aid. I know that at Cornell, whether we're a part of the Overlap Group or not, we're not going to move to merit-based aid."

"There are some things at Williams that are so important that we don't even budget for them," Winston said. "Need-blind admissions, for instance. We say that whatever it costs, we will pay...Like a lot of schools, it could become so expensive that we would have to give it up. But for right now, it is something in the budget that we approach as a given that we'll cover it."

Another reason that the elimination of the Overlap Group might not cause much change is that aid is governed by a strict federal formula.

"With financial aid, we now follow a very elaborate congressional methodology. We have no choice," Winston said. "Thirty years ago, mom and pop could simply hand some money to some nice kid (not a woman, notice). We don't do that anymore. There are very major changes in the way you go about doing things."

"I think it's important to remember that we all use the same formula given by the U.S. government and if we go on using that formula, which we're supposed to do, we shouldn't have any major differences between colleges," Myra Smith of the Smith College financial aid office said.

Saleh said that colleges could use their professional judgement to determine aid on a case-by-case basis, but would in general adhere to the formula.

"If a student calls up and asks why the University of Rochester expects them to pay $2000 and we expect them to pay $8000, it may cause us to go back and reread their folder to see if we missed something. Maybe as a result we will revise our estimate and then again maybe we won't."

Playing it straight

The former Williams official said that the formula would not protect the colleges against a bidding war, however. "If you had a system where there were no more meetings, but everyone said, 'We'll play it straight,' forget it!"

The codification of the need-analysis formula for campus-based aid into a law regulated cording to Markowitz, the financial aid burden of private colleges and universities has grown from 397 million in 1970-71 to 2.3 billion in 1987-88.

"The most proximate thing in recent years has been that colleges and universities have had to raise tuition to cover cut-backs in federal aid," he said. "In the last eight or nine years, the portion of aid provided by the federal government has declined from 83 percent to 75 percent. As much as 25 percent of the tuition increases in recent years have been turned around to make up for that federal aid."

According to the 1989-90 Williams prospectus, students now receive over $6 million in scholarships and aid from the college alone. In 1979, Williams students received $2,580,000 in scholarships and loans from Williams and outside sources combined.

Saleh said that Cornell's financial aid budget grew about 250 percent in the 1980s, from 5 to 18 million.

"Many institutions are looking at the same problem and ways to control that," he said, adding that some schools may go off need-blind admissions for reasons completely independent of the investigation. "In some schools it may be the straw that breaks the camel's back, but I think it would not be the primary reason."

Pressure on admissions

"Assuming that Bowdoin and Williams are already giving as much financial aid as they can afford, there would be a choice between raising tuition even more, which is already a very unpopular decision, or reducing the number of people in the financial aid budget. This would create more pressure on need-blind admissions."

Most schools said that they did not intend to change their policy unless forced to by other schools. "If one did probably not; if many did it might be difficult not to," Mersereau said, noting that Smith and Mount Holyoke Colleges offered small merit-based scholarships a few years ago and disbanded them because they were ineffective. He said, however, that if the scholarships involved thousands of dollars, the situation might be different.

"I think that students by-and-large choose institutions not based on financial reasons but based on that institution," Smith said. "I think you'd have to have some very significant discrepancies before financial conditions alone effect a student's decision of where to go to college."

Saleh said if schools at the bottom of the pecking order began to offer merit-based aid it would not affect the other schools, but if those at the top did they could force the others to follow suit.

"But I'm sure that the schools at the top of the pecking order would not start offering merit-based aid," he said.

Markowitz said that even if some of these schools changed their policies, the others would not have to follow.

"There are plenty of very good schools that are not part of that group...and many of them do offer merit-based scholarships."

Raising the money...

Campaign shoots for $150 million

by Dan Skwire
One hundred and fifty million dollars is a lot of money. That's $75,000 for every student currently at Williams. It's enough to buy 3 million calculus textbooks or 6,000 new Mercedes automobiles. It is also the amount of money that Williams College is attempting to raise in its Third Century Campaign.

"Well-endowed and well-supported though we are, we are in fact underendowed if we aspire not merely to endure, but truly to excel -- to reach out for leadership in American undergraduate education," College President Francis Oakley said at a press conference Friday.

The campaign, which officially begins with a celebration in New York City this Thursday, will ask alumni, friends, parents and businesses to contribute generously in recognition of the college's upcoming 200th birthday.

Peter S. Willmott '59, a college trustee, will chair the campaign. Projected gifts include $100 million in capital commitments, $13 million in bequests, $14 million from foundations and corporations and $23 million from the Alumni raised will go into the endowment. He expressed the hope that the increased portion of the endowment earmarked for financial aid would slow the increases in tuition costs.

"Today, endowment income is a smaller proportion of the operating budget than 20 years ago. Tuition, however, is much greater. Building the endowment may relieve pressure on tuition, but it would be highly unrealistic to say that tuition won't continue to rise."

The campaign will continue through 1993, the college's bicentennial year. The proceeds from five of Williams' annual Alumni Fund Drives will account for $23 million of the total, with the balance coming primarily from large alumni gifts.

Director of Annual Giving Peter Buttenheim, whose office runs the annual fund drive, said that he is excited to be a part of the Third Century Campaign. "We here in the Alumni Office feel that we've got a real part of this -- $23 million is not small change."

According to Buttenheim, the decision to extend the campaign over five years was a for the annual fund drive. Agents are selected by the outgoing class officers and serve five-year terms that end at reunions. They are responsible for contacting each member of their class and persuading him or her to donate to the Alumni Fund.

"Most of this work is not run by the Alumni Office -- it's run by the agents," Buttenheim said. "They are highly organized and outgoing people who know a great number of people in their class. We are here to support all of the agents' requests, whether for more envelopes or bookmarks or help making phone calls."

He added that the Fund. The last major fund-raising campaign undertaken by Williams was the Capital Fund for the Seventies. The college raised $52 million, much of which went toward new buildings, including Chandler Gymnasium.

According to Director of Development Michael Oman, however, only 21 percent of the funds from the Third Century Campaign will go toward building. Most of this $31.5 million will be directed at renovation of college facilities rather than new construction. Oman said that the college intends to renovate Sage and Williams Halls, build new faculty housing and possibly construct a small new dormitory.

People and programs

"This campaign is aimed at raising funds for people and programs as opposed to facilities," Oman said. Fifteen new endowed professorships will be established, and $25 million will be added to the endowment to support financial aid. Sizeable amounts will go toward supporting programs such as Williams in Oxford and the Center for Humanities and Social Sciences.

Oman said that 54 percent of the money calculated strategy. "Class reunions take place every five years, and during reunion year, classes are asked to do more. The capital campaign goes for five years in order to get every class once during a reunion."

Highest total ever

Last year's Alumni Fund is the first that will go toward the capital campaign. It raised $4,023,000, the highest total ever achieved, with over 65 percent of alumni contributing. The participation percentage is second in the nation, behind only Centre College in Kentucky.

Vice President for Alumni and Development Hodge Markgraf said that one major reason for Williams' high rate of alumni donations is the fact that alumni are solicited for only four months rather than an entire year.

"The alumni seem very pleased with the four-month Alumni Fund campaign. We barrage them with letters and phone calls, but only for 120 days. The amount of paper that we print and mail for the Alumni Fund drive is quite impressive."

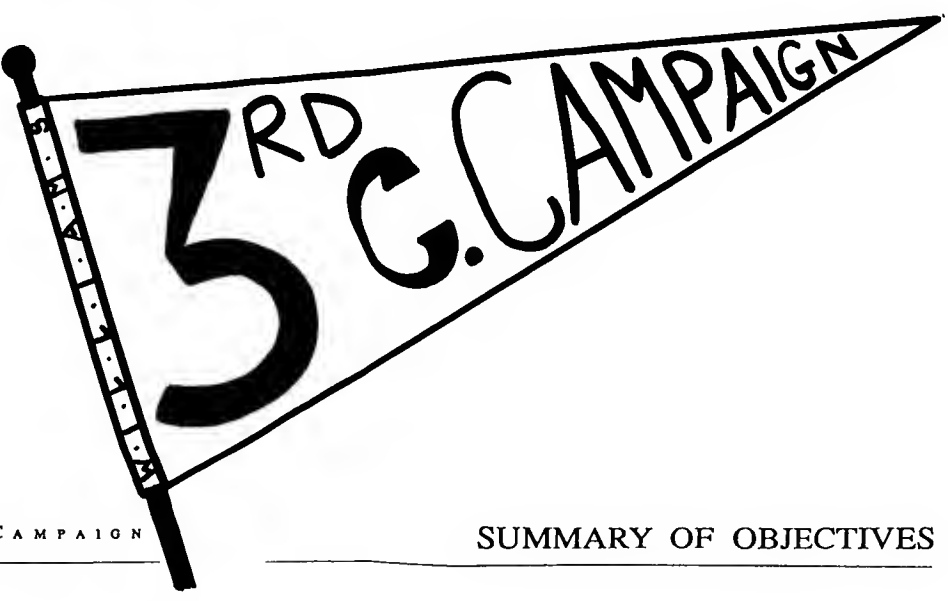

Buttenheim also gave credit to the network of class agents that does most of the dirty work agents' work is on a completely volunteer basis. They are not even compensated for their travel expenses to meetings in Williamstown and New York.

In only two days, then, Williams will take its first big step toward raising $150 million by hosting a dinner party for its alumni volunteers at the Morgan Library in New York City. For the next four years, the campaign will spread across the country, calling alumni in every major city to the aid of their alma mater.

Michael Oman, for one, is confident that the goal will be met. "Are we going to make it?" he said. "Yes. It's not going to be easy, but we're going to make it."

Profs claim faculty shortage is acute, but administrators disagree

by Sallie Han

As Williams approaches its bicentennial richer than most Third World countries, there are pressing demands on where this money should go and where it could take Williams in its third century.

Many faculty members said they feel an understaffing problem has assumed critical proportions. "If the faculty is going to continue traditional Williams commitment afford it. It should be an absolute first priority. Competition demands it. Otherwise we run the risk of losing Williams's pre-eminence."

"I think it's in the interest of the college to hire more faculty," Professor James Wood, chair of the history department, said. "It would allow us to do what we do even better. There are, of course, limits to what can be done."

"I think we're understaffed. We have lots of people in our department, lots of majors, lots of students, and we could definitely use some more bodies," he said.

There are 21 faculty members in the history department, 18 of whom are currently active on campus and represent 15 full time equivalents (FTEs), the college's measure of total annual faculty teaching.

Some of the faculty have, aside from their commitment to teaching, other administrative said. "But there has been a crunch."

Kaplan said that the chemistry department traditionally had a nine-member faculty. Within the past few years that number has dropped.

"Last year we were not authorized to bring back that number up to where it had been. We were told by the Committee on Appointments and Promotions that we were capped at a certain number of FTEs. We were held from going to a level of stacking that I thought would be appropriate."

Kaplan said that he expects that if, with the proposed workload reduction for faculty, there is no increase in faculty size, there will be fewer courses to select, larger classes and a tighter squeeze for the faculty.

However, the administration seemed to disagree with what Baker termed a faculty "consensus" on this issue.

ments, there should be an overall faculty increase by fifteen members," Professor of Political Science and department chair Raymond Baker said. "The feeling is very strong among the faculty. There is a consensus that the overall size of the faculty should be increased by eight or nine per cent."

Many faculty, he said, feel that the college is not monetarily committed to heavy recruiting. Baker said, "I think the college has to and social responsibilities, such as their roles as freshman advisers, which occupy a good deal of their interest and time. Many faculty members invest part of their energy in the development of new programs at Williams, such as the Center for Humanities and Social Sciences.

Over the last several years new programs of study, such as Asian studies, have been added to the college's offerings and as a result, some faculty members have additional teaching responsibilities.

"I think there's a need for a few more faculty members if we keep the same programs and departments. The pressure for hiring new faculty comes from the fact that the college is constantly creating new programs in addition to offering the more traditional courses," Professor Lawrence Kaplan, the chair of the chemistry department, said.

"With the college developing other kinds of programs, both for the students and the faculty, there will be pressure to hire more faculty. I'm not being critical of the new programs," Kaplan

"I don't know what people are talking about when they say the size of the faculty should increase," Dean of the Faculty John Reichert said. "The faculty has been increasing."

For the 1989-1990 academic year the FTE is 174.0, a "considerable" increase, according to Reichert, from last year's FTE of 169.3.

"The size of the faculty has been rising steadily. I would expect that it would continue to grow," Reichert said. "But there's no plan specifically targeted to increase the size of the faculty. It will continue to increase as it has been generally increasing."

"This faculty has been growing at a substantial rate," Provost of the College Gordon Winston said. "We're running into a time when there is going to be a crunch on the faculty. Certainly it is one of the competing claims on the college's money [but] it's not obvious that hiring on more faculty will have the same priority."

'It's just supply and demand'

Ph.D. shortage will force faculty salaries up

by Dan Silverman

In these days of anti-trust investigations, tuition hikes, projected Ph.D. shortages and a constant pressure to remain at the top of the college ranks, the subject of faculty salaries is one of the touchier issues at Williams.

Both students and federal investigators want to know how much Williams professors are paid, how their salaries are determined and how their earnings compare to those of the faculties of other prestigious colleges.

According to the March-April 1989 issue of Academe, the bulletin published by the American Association of University Professors, the average full professor at Williams earns $57,400 per year. Full profs earn $72,400 on average when compensations like medical insurance, life insurance, workman's compensation and retirement plans are taken into account.

Associate professors earn an average of $40,500 and $51,200 with compensations. Assistant professors receive $34,000 and $43,700 with compensations.

There are 187 full-time faculty members at Williams, according to the 1989 prospectus.

The salaries paid to full professors along with those paid to associate and assistant professors put Williams in the 95+ percentile for all four-year colleges without extensive graduate programs. This ranking includes schools like Amherst and Bowdoin, but does not compare Williams with major research institutions like Harvard and Yale or even small universities like Wesleyan.

What do these figures mean to the people making the salary decisions at Williams? According to Dean of Faculty John Reichert, who along with President Oakley and Provost Gordon Winston have final say on faculty salaries, not that much.

"Insofar as you're competing with those schools for faculty, you're going to want to try to do as well as you can on the salary front...But we're thinking about our own salary trajectory over the years, not theirs."

The competition for faculty and national prestige could, however, play a significant role in determining the salaries Williams will offer.

"If you notice college 'X' went up by 12 per cent [in salary] and lo and behold they've caught you; you'll take that into consideration," Reichert said.

"Over half of the budget goes to salaries and

Reichert said he does not see a more dramatic future increase in faculty salaries because of the threat of colleges like Amherst, Wesleyan or Colgate, which dropped its January term this year in order to better compete with the Little Three.

Reichert said he did see the projected Ph.D. shortage as a potential initiator of higher faculty salaries.

"I think in the long run that will drive improving steadily as colleges like Williams are forced to compete with the interests of other business and academic institutions. If trends of doubling average salaries every ten years continue the average Williams full professor you meet on the street in 2000 A.D. could be making 120,000 bucks a year.

The current procedures for salary determination involve a thorough review system. The Dean of Faculty, the Provost and the President of the College review the Committee on Appointments and Promotions reports for each faculty member once a year. It is the responsibility of the department chairs to produce reports for the tenured faculty in their department. The reports give progress checks on achievements, teaching, scholarship and service to the community.

Full and associate professors are responsible for evaluating the assistant professors in their department. Reichert also receives scholarship and achievement updates directly from each faculty member once a year. Faculty salaries are adjusted every year according to inflation and the content of these various reports.

For newly hired assistant professors, the level at which Williams does the vast majority of its hiring, there is a benchmark salary used as a standard base. According to Reichert, there are exceptions where an assistant will warrant a higher salary. A candidate with teaching experience or one who has worked with a major research group could earn a bit more. Certain departments are also forced by competition to offer their beginning professors larger checks.

"There are certain fields, economics and computer science are examples, where salaries tend to be higher in large measure because we're not just competing with other colleges," Reichert said. "We're competing with banks, the International Monetary Fund and the business world."

salaries up. It's just supply and demand."

"We're facing a period now where faculty salaries are clearly going to rise, because of a coming shortage of faculty," Provost of the College Gordon Winston agreed. "We'll get to the point at which starting salaries for faculty are within $40,000 of starting salaries for lawyers."

In general, the faculty salary situation is in an increasingly competitive market you need to give more than a cost of living increase to professors," College Treasurer and Vice President Will Reed said. "We're in a very fast track and we have to keep up. The competition for faculty is so keen that we pay dearly if we don't match our competitors in attractive offers.

Faculty salaries have increased every year since he assumed a position as dean in 1983. But not enough money to continually update the equipment. We have been able to do so mainly due to outside grants," Kaplan said. "A fair amount of money goes into research-oriented equipment but we need money to upgrade the very basic pieces needed for teaching. The college, at least up until now, has not been providing us with that kind of money."

The Division III departments have been allotted $5 million for laboratories and equipment from the $150 million the college hopes to raise through its bicentennial campaign.

Yet that doesn't measure up to the $8 million which the development office said has been allotted for student housing. With that money the college plans large-scale renovation on the older dorms and construction of a small new freshman dorm.

"There's a very clear program of renovating dorms," Winston said. "The renovations involve bringing things up to code, changing the configuration in some of the dorms."

This past summer the renovation of Fayerweather Hall and the second of three phases of renovation at Mission Park were completed. The latter involved a cosmetic upgrading of Armstrong House and Pratt House as well as the gallery which runs the length of the building.

The first phase of renovation on Mills and Dennett Houses was completed last summer. The third phase will involve the recreations rooms on both sides of the south entry, the entry itself, the stairs down to the dining hall and possibly also the downstairs lounges.

Renovation on Morgan Hall is scheduled for next summer and work is expected to be done on both Williams and Sage halls in 1994.

"It's a ten-year plan, with some on-going maintenance and improvement," Housing Director Tom McEvoy said. "It's a pretty large-scale renovation. We're basically doing a dorm a year. Every older building is scheduled for renovation some time in the future."

Renovation on West College will also take place in the near future. McEvoy said that the administration expected to do work on Fitch, Currier and the Greylock Quad some time in the 1990s but that plans for these buildings were not yet definite.

There are also no concrete plans yet for new faculty housing. According to McEvoy, a special committee to formulate a future housing

Managing $325 million

Williams plays the stock market

by Justin Smlth

"The reason that Williams doesn't go belly up is that we're sitting here after roughly 200 years of people making outright gifts that have accumulated in the form of an endowment, from which we earn a fair amount of money. We use that money to keep you guys from having to pay $40,000 a year."

Gordon Winston, Professor of Economics and Provost of the College

The $325 million Williams endowment is the most important financial resource available to the college. Interest earned on that money provides approximately half of the operating cost of the college. As a result, managing the endowment has become one of the school's most crucial administrative duties.

As the endowment has increased rapidly in the 1980s, proper management of the funds and the way they are invested has become even more important, not just because of the larger amounts of money involved, but because of a heightened awareness of the need for social responsibility when making investment decisions.

"The endowment has built up over many years and has come almost exclusively from gifts from alumni," said College Treasurer Will Reed. "The college is not shy about soliciting contributions.

"We do it through direct conversations with individuals," he added. "Quite often we have a particular program that we think they might be interested in supporting, and invariably the President goes and asks them for a large gift.

Requests

"I would guess that the largest gifts have come to the college through bequests, people who have included the college in their wills, and often just for the general endowment."

Alumni have not been the sole source of funds, however. "There have been foundation and corporation gifts, but I would say maybe 90 percent of it has come from the alumni and bequests to the college from alumni," Reed said.

The endowment has also contributed to its own growth over the years. "It has grown through our investment policies," Reed said.

According to Reed, the Board of Trustees controls the endowment in conjunction with two investment firms. "We have two outside money managers to make the actual investment decisions, and they have a large part of the endowment and invest it daily for us."

"We have a trustee finance committee that oversees the two managers and they also invest about a third of the endowment themselves, i.e.

make recommendations as to where it should be spent," Reed continued. "So we have two outside managers and a third manager, the finance committee of the college. The trustees have a fair amount of say."

Social responsibility

In addition to the Finance Committee, the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility exerts influence on college investment decisions by making policy recommendations. The ACSR studies issues of social responsibility in investment practices.

A last resort

Sometimes, however, the college will resort

The Market Value of the Williams Endowment

"The reason the ACSR was set up was to advise the finance committee on how to vote proxies," said Reed, who is a member of the committee. "Some of the issues are very complex and this committee advises the board. The college tries to invest in socially responsible corporations and we exercise that responsibility by voting on proxies."

According to Reed, the issue of social responsibility first became a factor in the investment policies of the college in the late seventies. "We were one of the first schools to do this. I think the question of South Africa came up then, and it's been with us ever since," Reed said.

According to Political Science Professor and ACSR chair MacAlister Brown, the administration takes issues of social responsibility into account in its investment decisions. "My own opinion is that we do, and I think that the Williams College trustees do too, but I don't think that they have formulated an explicit policy about that."

While the ACSR is supposed to function as an advisory body, its recommendations carry a lot of weight with the trustees. "We make recommendations, we don't decide," Brown said. "The Finance Committee and the Board of Trustees have accepted our recommendation in all cases."

According to Brown, in instances where the college owns stock in a company involved in South Africa, for example, the college prefers to hold onto the stock and exert influence in proxy votes to get the company to stop its questionable dealings. It is a rarity that Williams will pull out of a corporation dealing in South Africa.

vulnerable than a corporation would be," Reed said.

According to Reed, this is because stock market fluctuations and correspondingly erratic year-to-year fluctuations in the amount of the endowment do not have an immediate impact on how much money the college draws out of the endowment in a given year.

"The amount we take from the endowment each year is not dependent on the performance of the endowment in that year. We take a longer-term perspective," Reed said. "So the income that we receive in any one year would remain fairly constant. If the endowment dropped by half, obviously over time that would affect the college, but for the current students that would not have an immediate impact."

Had the college not recouped its 1987 loss of $40 million, the effect of that loss would only now begin to become apparent in the college's spending decisions.

The national economic expansion of the last six years largely accounts for the dramatic increase of the endowment in the last decade. "It was primarily the stock market. The stock market has increased dramatically and we were fortunate to have enough money to have it well positioned so that when the stock market took off we were ready to participate," Reed said. "I think our endowment has been well-managed; it's done very well."

According to Reed, the health of the economy has also boosted contributions from alumni. "I think this last year was the second-best year in the history of the college. [The economy] certainly helps. People feel wealthier," Reed said.

Augmenting recent efforts, the college is making preparations for its Third-Century Fundraising Campaign. According to Reed, the college plans to raise $150 million through this campaign.

"The hope there is to provide more support for scholarships, for faculty salaries and for academic programs, that's the main emphasis," Reed said. "By getting more funds then we can put less pressure on the budget, so it's going to be a very important campaign for the college."

According to Winston, large infusions to the endowment are necessary on a regular basis to keep the endowment at its real value each year. "For a $300 million endowment to stand still, it's got to increase by $21 million [per annum]," he said. "We've got to pick up the inflation rate plus two percent just to break even. But do we want to just break even? Not if we expect quality to improve over time, and if colleges we compare ourselves with are getting better, we've better keep up with them."

but that doesn't mean we are going to use them up," Winston continued. "If we are to continue to provide the kind of education students expect of Williams, we can do so by being careful."

Another area of budgetary concern is providing top-flight equipment, especially for the hard sciences, according to Professor of Physics and department chair Ballard Pierce. "Equipment, that's a continuing problem. This is not in the physics department alone. It's a continuing need and the departments recognize that and the administration recognizes that. The college has been as helpful as they can on that."

Associate Professor Karen Kwitter, the chair of the astronomy department, said that the best way to get money for equipment was to apply for grants from sources like the National Science Foundation. The Sloan Foundation and the Ford Foundation provide the college with funds which go primarily toward the development of new courses. These grants are matched one-to-one by the college.

"The budget that I get is enough to maintain educational programs in the department. It is

by Mary Moule

The new Multicultural Center, Bolin Fellowships, and curricular offerings such as tutorials, area studies concentrations, and small departments all add to the diversity at Williams College in a very real way. Unfortunately, they carry with them some very real costs.

It is difficult to determine the financial costs of many of the programs that add to diversity at Williams, according to Associate Dean Preston Smith. The renovating and operating costs of the new center and the salaries to Bolin Fellows carry concrete price tags.

But the financial component of curricular diversity is more abstract. "These kinds of costs are hard to pin down," Smith said.

"Let me give you a couple of scenarios," Provost of the College Gordon Winston said. "We can stumble along and try something like tutorials, not having thought through very carefully what it's going to cost...because we just haven't had the time. We can try it and find that it's very popular, but prohibitively expensive and abandon it."

"Alternatively, we can take a fairly hard look at what it's likely to mean in terms of staffing costs and building costs and schedules, and get a reasonably good idea of what it's going to cost to go in that direction, and then ask, 'Is it worth it?' We can do that, and we do do it, but it's very expensive."

The risks of being new

Smith pointed out that questions about the costs of new programs may arise simply because there is no budgetary precedent to follow.

"Is it an extra price because we're adding it [to the curriculum]? Are other things acceptable because they've already been here?"

"There was a very strong competitive pressure in the 80s on [colleges] to increase services, to do better, to give our customers more services than we'd been giving them in the past," Winston added. "If [other schools] had Asian languages and we hadn't put in an Asian languages program, we certainly had to worry about it...There was an immense pressure in society...and on schools like Williams to produce a very high quality, high cost product."

"The Peoples and Cultures division requirement is an effort in that direction," Smith said. "There is a sense that the curriculum has a good selection now."

College administrators were quick to maintain the necessity of a diverse curriculum. Smith suggested that increasing curricular diversity may require a shifting of resources. "There is a predominantly white curriculum selected in New England tradition. Do you trade off some of that in order to expand?" he asked.

Western arrogance

"We need to get away from the arrogance of the assumption that mainstream Western tradition is the only way to look at the world," Professor of History Thomas Spear, who chairs the African and Middle Eastern Studies concentration, said. "Today, nobody can be educated without knowledge of the rich diversity of the world."

Spear also pointed out that the addition of concentration programs is not costly. "Virtually everyone in the history department is involved with a program, and the department is able to offer far more diversity. The end result is that no college of this size has our strong programs or as broad a History department."

"Concentration courses aren't taking anything from other departments," agreed Professor of History Dennis Dickerson, the chair of the Afro-American Studies concentration. "And

Professor Antonio Gimenez and Dennis Ortiz '92 meet for a Spanish tutorial. Tutorials are one example of new programs Williams is sponsoring to promote curricular diversity. (Isackson)

Afro-American history is fundamental to understanding the American experience."

"As far as I'm concerned, the benefits far outweigh the costs," Smith added. "We're not a profit-making institution, but we have to remain solvent. We have to balance those activities that are profit-making with those that are not. For instance, the humanities are not as lucrative. There's less outside funding. But you aren't a college without them."

"All of this worry about money has two objectives basically: the quality of the faculty and the quality of the students," Winston said. "Those two are absolutely the bottom line of all of this worry about tuition and the endowment and costs. Those are the things that get threatened, and those are things we try to protect."

The smaller of the academic departments seem to be an area in which the college could do more to increase its curricular diversity. Although departments such as Classics and Anthropology and Sociology may have as few as two majors some years, they still do their best to provide a variety of courses, according to the classics department chair, Meredith Hoppin.

Yet being a small department means enormous problems in terms of the availability of faculty to teach as many courses and sections that they would like, Hoppin said. This makes it difficult to provide diversity within the department.

"We can't divide courses into sections. We're faced with the dilemma of being too big or of turning away students...We can't offer many electives. We can't contribute to other programs, as we would like to do."

"I think that [the college] has made an excellent commitment in new areas such as Asian studies," Hoppin continued. "But they tend to be more focused on that than on small departments."

Small means less diversity

Professor Robert Jackall, chair of the departments of Anthropology and Sociology, agreed with the difficulty of working within a smaller field at Williams.

"We need more resources. The large departments get a larger share and students tend to gravitate toward them because of their diversity."

So to help develop more diversity within the departments, the faculty would like to closely unify Anthropology and Sociology. Starting this spring, majors in both departments will take combined methodology and theory courses.

"Williams will be unique among comparable institutions for a joint department in the way in which we are doing it," Jackall said. By concentrating on field work, he said, students would be more able to make sense of the social world in which they live.

Despite the problems in providing electives which many smaller departments face, they can still contribute greatly to the overall diversity of the curriculum. The sociology and anthropology departments offer more courses approved for the new Peoples and Cultures requirement than any other department on campus, according to Jackall.

And Smith reiterated the importance of that diversity to the success of Williams in putting out a quality "product."

"Can you say that you're providing a good liberal arts education if you don't provide [this diversity]? Without that, students won't be prepared to deal with the real world."

An accident waiting to happen

Alcohol liability has administrators worried

by Rajesh Swaminathan

Alcohol consumption has long been an issue on campus. Under Massachusetts state law, Williams is supposed to be roughly three-quarters dry; that it is not becomes patently obvious as the weekend approaches.

But while students are partying during alcohol-soaked weekends, nightmares about students being injured in alcohol-related accidents keep many administrators from sleeping.

According to the Treasurer's Office, Williams has not yet been involved in an alcohol-related legal incident involving damage to person or property. Nevertheless, the college has been concerned about the possibility of such an incident for quite some time now.

"We're obviously concerned about these issues of damage to property or to people, whether they are alcohol-related or not," Dean of the College Stephen Fix said. "Of course, we are deeply concerned with alcohol-related incidents, [both] from a disciplinary point of view and from a health point of view."

The legal and financial ramifications of such an incident could be potentially disastrous for the college. If a civil suit were filed against a student for damage to either property or person while under the influence of alcohol, it is likely that either the college or the host of the party in question, and perhaps both, would be named as defendants.

Williams requires the "responsible student host" of a party (usually a house president or student organization leader) to sign a statement affirming his responsibilities as a student host when registering a party with Security. These include making sure that intoxicated students leaving the party do not drive, that non-Williams students do not attend the party, and that the alcohol served is limited to an amount specified by Security.

However, despite these precautions, it is likely that a liability suit would not focus only on the student host.

"[The general principle], increasingly, is that liability is being broadly understood rather than narrowly," Fix said. "In the current legal context, [the attitude of the prosecution is] typically the more the merrier."

Bruce Grinnell, a Williamstown attorney who has represented the college on several matters, said, "It's probably correct that in most litigation, a 'deep pocket' theory [holds true]." He said that a civil damage suit would be filed against the student responsible for the damage.

"A creative plaintiff lawyer will sue as many as he can, hoping to set up a negotiated settlement," he added. "He will try to involve the college in one form or other; the house president could be involved and it could be very expensive."

In fact, according to Fix, there was talk last year of bringing a lawyer knowledgeable about alcohol-related liability issues to speak to house presidents. However, the administration has made no such move as of yet.

Grinnell declined to give an estimate of the size of the reparations the injured party would seek in a hypothetical situation involving damage to property or person. But he repeatedly stressed that such a situation could prove to be very costly for all named as defendants.

Judy Frazier, assistant to the vice president for administration, said that the college is prepared for such a contingency. "The college has rather high limits on liabilities, up to one million dollars. We have excess insurance to protect us [against] a suit of up to $26 million."

She declined to give the exact annual amount that the college pays for its insurance policy; but she added, "We do pretty well."

In spite of the potentially high liability suits the college faces, Fix said that there were no existing plans to drastically revise college party policy. However, he did not rule out the possibility of introducing change. He emphasized that any initiative undertaken by the administration depended on a variety of criteria.

"One of the most important is the behavior of students; they are aware that both legal and social attitudes on this campus have changed. The other deans and I have concerns about the use of alcohol on this campus, its legal use and proper use. In general, [we have had] extremely good cooperation from students. Concerns about one particular aspect of the party policy have arisen. But like any policy, it is constantly under review."

Crackdown

As the Record reported last week, constant review has meant a number of changes in the rules. In the 1987-88 school year, the college announced an eight-keg limit for all campus parties. Alcohol consumption at the Log has been drastically curtailed.

The newest changes focus on freshman entries, which differ from upperclass dorms in terms of liability because the overwhelming majority of residents are known to be underage. The current system is based on escalating fines, which are put on the junior advisers' term bills.

The Record attempted to reach Dean of Housing Andrew Hernandez, who acts as liaison between the Dean's office and house presidents, but he declined to speak on the issue of liability and campus alcohol policy.

that they are bound to accept any expenditures the college deems necessary and must willingly pay for them. The administration is able to exploit this assumption by excluding students from the process of priority setting and budget making, aside from token representation on invisible rubber-stamp committees.

They feel it sufficient after passing along a $1600 increase to provide only general information ex post facto about where the money is actually going. As a result of the lack of student and parent input, the administration and alumni have too much say in determining institutional priorities, and students, who pay for the priorities, have too little say in determining them.

Skewed plans

The college's long range plans are skewed. It doesn't take an expert in long-range planning or the intricacies of formulating a budget to know that a disproportionate amount of money is going into buildings and not enough is going into improving the classroom experience.

Class sizes are larger than they should be for a college that prides itself on intimate relations between students and faculty members, and course offerings are often shockingly limited (too many courses are bracketed), because there are too few faculty members on campus during a given semester.

While there is a less than desirable number of faculty members on campus, the naked eye can see that the physical plant is bordering on the point of being ridiculously extravagant. Did Hopkins "Mall" really need to cost what it did? Did it really need wall-to-wall mirrors in the hallways? These are the kinds of questions that we as paying members of the college should be allowed to ask before projects begin, and we should expect to receive specific answers.

There is a definite disparity between the college's priorities as an institution and as a school. The art museum is a good example of this. Following a massive and expensive expansion, the WCMA changed its focus from being a teaching facility whose activities are closely tied to the art department to being a "cultural draw" for the Berkshires. This is typical.

By demanding more of a say in the budget-making process, students can narrow the gap between the college's institutional goals and its goals as an undergraduate school.

There are three possibilities as far as how students feel about all this.

Possibility number one is that they are happy with current tuition levels and comfortable with the size of recent increases. These students must agree with how the administration has allocated resources and they must share the college's priority schedule, with its overemphasis on extravagant facilities. If this is the case, do they have money to burn?

Possibility number two is that they must have not thought about it all that much. They might be unhappy with the price increases, but just assume that it must be necessary if the college says that it is necessary.

Possibility number three is that students and parents are dissatisfied with the current level, but cannot see that they can do much about it, seeing that they have already committed themselves to this institution.

Competition

One response we can expect to hear from the administration is that Williams costs are in line with or slightly less than colleges "with which Williams competes for students and faculty."

Are we competing on the basis of price or quality? Administrators have said in the past that they aren't just boosting the price to make Williams look like Chivas Regal -- that is, that they aren't jacking up the price to create the impression that they are providing a better education. Yet their constant emphasis on our relative position with these institutions price-wise seems to undermine the credibility of this argument.

This is a seller's market, an inelastic demand curve. Until students and their parents give some kind of indication to the college that they are mad as hell and unwilling to pay the prices, the increases will probably continue. The college can assume that we are happy paying their exorbitant prices because we don't tell them otherwise.

In the absence of any kind of protest, the college seems to be determined to take us for all we are worth and bleed us dry. We can do a number of different things: write letters, stage demonstrations, or refuse to pay more than last year's tuition. Students need access to information, and a collaborative process must occur in which students help to set the college's priorities.

After all, we pay for it. And at this point, we have lost control over the process.

Chaos ensues over KAOS '90

by Sallie Han

There seems to be a certain degree of chaos covering KAOS on campus. Both the Williams Association of Role Players and the coordinator of last year's Killing As an Organized Sport claim to be running the game this year. They are each independently organizing their own games for winter study. Neither are willing to surrender KAOS control.

Signs in Baxter and elsewhere around campus read, "KAOS. Killing As an Organized Sport. Brought to you by your friends at WARP."

However, a KAOS mailing to all freshmen read, "WARP is a pirate organization. Play their version of KAOS at your own risk."

WARP co-founder Toby Elliott '92 said that although WARP had been planning to absorb KAOS since last spring, they did not actually discuss these plans with last year's KAOS coordinator (who asked that his name not be used in the article) until this fall. He said that although last year's KAOS coordinator had initially been hostile to handing over control, it was finally agreed that WARP would run KAOS.

"I talked to last year's coordinator. He basically said he wasn't going to [run KAOS] this year," Elliott said. "He said he'd let us run it and he hoped we wouldn't mess it up."

Elliott said that he was surprised to learn that last year's KAOS coordinator was planning to run another KAOS game this year. He said that he had thought that the matter had been settled and that WARP would be running KAOS this year.

"He's lying," the coordinator of last year's KAOS said. He said he preferred to remain anonymous "for the sake of the game," to maintain the anonymity of KAOS control.

"They never met with me to ask me about who was running KAOS. I've never even met Toby Elliott. He called me and asked me if it was all settled. I said no, but that there was nothing I could do about it if they insisted on running their own game," he said.

More debate over the core

NEH proposes core curriculum

by Robert Weisberg

The core curriculum has often been at the center of the debate over the quality of higher education. Now, the National Endowment for the Humanities has thrown its hat into the ring, endorsing a 50-hour series of courses that should be required of all college students.

In its 50 Hours: A Core Curriculum for College Students, released last week, NEH suggests that students take several one-semester courses in history, math, social sciences and foreign language.

This follows several other documents from the federal government over the last few years that have encouraged a more standardized approach to education. Social commentators such as E.D. Hirsch, Jr. of the University of Virginia (a panelist at the 1989 Williams Convocation) have written that Americans need a basis of common knowledge, lest our society be damaged by breakdowns in cultural communication.

The Bush Administration has taken a contradictory path: suggesting increased structuring of programs at the college level while encouraging a freer, more open role for secondary schools.

The NEH report is better than most of its kind in spelling out how the core should be arranged. Still, the report makes one wonder if NEH and its chairman, Lynn Cheney, really understand just what a core is all about.

Lack of knowledge

The impetus for the report was a Gallup test of college seniors that revealed, as far as the government is concerned, some shocking shortcomings in knowledge.

According to NEH, "Using the standard 'A' to 'F' scale, where a less than 60-percent-correct score means failure, 55 percent of the seniors would have received a grade of 'F' and another 20 percent a 'D.'" The test had 87 questions on a variety of topics and was based on a 33-question exam intended to test high schools juniors.

Distribution requirements

In the battle between the core and a free-wheeling, no-requirements curriculum, the distribution requirement has been seen as a compromise of sorts. At other schools, such as Yale University, students have the option of taking a limited core for their first two years, though this program generally concentrates on the humanities.

Surprisingly, Cheney makes little mention of this. While she acknowl-

News Analysis

Even had they taken the more basic test, 49 percent of college seniors would have failed, according to the report. In addition, students at private schools scored only marginally better than those at public colleges and universities.

NEH is not only bothered by the apparent ignorance of college students, which has been well documented, but also by what it perceives as a lack of structure in collegiate curriculums. "Enticing students often find few requirements in place and a plethora of offerings... In the absence of an ordered plan of study, some undergraduates manage to put together coherent and substantive programs, but others move through college years with little rationale," according to Cheney.

A press release accompanying the report, which was sent, unsolicited, to the Record, states, "In place of a strong core, many colleges have loosely stated 'distribution requirements,' directing that students take some courses in certain areas and some in others."

To bolster NEH's case, Cheney lists many fluff courses, such as Lifetime Fitness, which she says can be used to fulfill distribution requirements at some universities. Cheney is disgusted by the lack of rigor in college programs.

The Social Sciences and the Modern edges "50 Hours is not offered as a single prototype," the NEH report is rather explicit that it is a guide for what students should be studying.

In addition, Cheney makes no exception for students who may have already studied works to be covered in the core: "... so long as these works are profound, provocative, and revealing, these students will again be challenged."

The courses

Here is a brief overview of the core courses suggested, as quoted from 50 Hours:

The Origins of Civilization: a one-semester course that considers the beginnings of civilization on various continents.

Western Civilization: a one-semester course that considers the development of Western society and thought from Periclean Athens through the Reformation.

Western Civilization (continued): a one-semester course that considers the development of Western society and thought from the Reformation into the 20th century.

American Civilization: a one-semester course that traces major developments in American society and thought from colonial times to the present.

Other Civilizations: two one-semester courses from the following: civilizations of Africa, East Asia, Islam, Latin America, South Asia.

Foreign Language: a two-year requirement; it is recommended that students fulfill this requirement by taking more advanced courses in a language they studied in high school.

Concepts of Mathematics: a one-year course focusing on major concepts, methods and applications of mathematical sciences.

Foundations of the Natural Sciences: a one-year laboratory course that focuses on major ideas and methods of the physical and biological sciences.

Williams students will soon be responsible for separating their trash when in January Williamstown enacts a new bylaw that will make recycling mandatory. (Jenkins)

Recycling coming to Williams

by Steve Buschman

Students who have patronized Papa Charlie's Deli on Spring Street lately have noticed the 100 percent increase in the number of trash cans in the building. The change will be coming to the college and to dorm rooms soon, as a new town ordinance takes effect.

Because of space problems at a regional landfill, most northern Berkshire County communities, including Williamstown, will be sending their trash to a recycling plant in Springfield. However, to join the recycling plant, each town has had to pass a bylaw that makes recycling a mandatory habit.

The Mandatory Recycling Bylaw, which will take effect in January, requires that trash be separated into three categories: glass and cans, paper, and non-recyclable trash. People who don't can be fined by the town, though the amounts have yet to be worked out.

But how will 2,000 independent-minded students living in dorms where empty pizza boxes take up most usable floor space adjust to change?

To facilitate disposal, the college will provide students with separate trash cans, including enough for all dormitory rooms. Students will be required only to distinguish the type of trash -- whether it is recyclable or not -- they are discarding.

Students generally have had a positive reaction to the new law, though some were bothered by the coming inconvenience.

Yumio Saneyoshi-san '91 said she liked the change. "Our civilization wastes too much paper," she said. "I never heard of anything like this."

Amy Dworski '90 said, "It's going to be an inconvenience, but I guess it's going to be a good idea."

"It's a wonderful idea if they're providing us with separate garbage cans. Such a little change can make a big difference. It'll heighten people's awareness," Monica Brand '91 said.

"I think it's certainly the biggest step that this community could take facing the problem of solid waste," Philip Coulling '90 said. "It's long overdue and should be mandatory across the U.S. no matter how full the landfills are. I'm concerned with how the college will respond."

To heighten community awareness about the trash problem, the college chapter of the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group is conducting a Community Outreach Program in the Williamstown public schools, according to chapter president John Freedman '91. Members of MassPIRG will talk to students about the growing problems -- including solid waste disposal -- faced by society.

MassPIRG built a mound of trash on Baxter lawn last week to increase student awareness at the college level as well. Williamstown officials were sanguine about students doing their part to keep the regulation in effect. Chairman of the town Board of Selectmen Paul Hamors said, "My feeling is that Williams will cooperate because it feels that it is a part of the community."

Selectman Alan George added "Williams College has been wonderful. It has been working hand in hand with us."

George said he felt that the college would be very cooperative and even more so than the town as a whole. "It's a good role-model for the community and the largest single user and provider of recyclables," he said.

U.S. News ranks us number three again

by Kevin Greenberg

Get those t-shirt slogans ready. Once again, Williams was named the third best national liberal arts college in the United States, according to U.S. News & World Report.

In its annual college issue, which came out October 16, the national news magazine ranked Williams behind Swarthmore College and Amherst College for the second straight year. U.S. News based its rankings on academic reputation, student selectivity, faculty quality, retention patterns, and the financial resources of a college. Williams was the second-ranked college in each of the first four categories and placed seventh in the financial resource division.

Williams's hopes to bolster its financial strength with the Third Century Campaign, a fundraising drive with a goal of $150 million by 1993.

"The two-two-two-two-seven is definitely striking, and the timing is excellent," Director of Public Information Jim Kolesar said.

Kolesar added that Williams' standing in the financial resources category coincides with college documents. "We're not poor, but when you have to compete with the most well-off institutions, you have to be well off yourself," he said.

"Maybe it's a blessing in disguise that we are ranked where we are ranked in terms of financial resources because it may give some legitimacy to the financial campaign and maybe the alumni will be concerned," Acting Director of Admissions Tom Parker said. He added that the admissions office is happy with the results of the survey.

"It probably gives us a certain legitimacy we would not otherwise have in certain quarters of the populace," he said. "The fact that on a yearly basis Williams always does well -- either one,

The Williams Record

Up, up and away!

With last Thursday's gala dinner in New York City, Williams has now officially begun its Third Century Campaign to raise $150 million in gifts from alumni and friends. Every student in the school should be eager to see the college reach its goal.

President Oakley has said that the bulk of the money will be put toward "people and programs" rather than buildings, and this is an admirable decision. With the construction of Chandler Gymnasium, the renovation of Hopkins Hall and the current work on the Jewish student center, the campus has certainly seen its share of scaffolding, cement mixers and bulldozers.

On the other hand, many of the programs targeted to receive money from the Third Century Campaign are drastically in need of funding. No less than $25 million has been scheduled to go into the endowment to support financial aid. This, in effect, represents an insurance policy which will enable the college to continue its need-

Another area worthy of special note is the $4 million that will be put toward supporting summer internships for Williams students who wish to do research with faculty on campus. Many such internships are already in place, most notably in Division III, but they rely on grants for their support. The addition of $4 million into the endowment will guarantee that there will be funds for continuing these programs and developing similar ones in the humanities.

The college has set quite a goal for itself in this campaign, but Williams alumni have always proven themselves ready to come to the aid of their alma mater. When the money starts rolling in, and ultimately it will, let's hope that the college carries through on its commitment to provide some real support for its people and programs.

Display needs additional explanation

To the editor:

I am the coordinator of the Feminist Alliance, the group of students who put together the display case on rape in Baxter Hall, and a rape crisis counselor for the local hotline. I would like to respond to some of the comments that we received. The most polite way to summarize certain of the comments is "Why did you find it necessary to put up this display?" Mostly, we want Williams students to know what rape is and how often it happens. In hopes that individual people will treat rape victims with more respect and sympathy and will take measures to prevent rape from occurring.

There was a great deal of concern about one of the statistics we cited: "One in three women in the U.S. will be raped in her lifetime." This is according to the FBI uniform crime statistics. Those numbers are true for females born in the 1970s, and the FBI believes that rape is on the rise (actual incidence of the crime, not just reports).

Devra Bellin, in her letter to the Record, found these numbers implausible because they indicated that many of the men she knew to be kind, sensitive people were rapists. Her perceptions and those statistics are not at all incompatible.

The fact that one woman in three becomes a rape victim does not mean that one man in three becomes a rapist. Rape, unlike many other serious crimes, has a high recidivism rate. In plain English, someone who commits rape and is sent to jail for it is very likely to rape again and again. I suspect that for acquaintance rape, which carries almost no consequences at all, it is even worse. One rapist can attack many women.

Moreover, most rapists are very normal guys. I have met several men whom I knew to have raped someone, and been shocked to discover what normal, charming and considerate people they were. One of them considered himself a feminist. The problem is that a lot of "normal" men believe some very strange things about women and about sex.

I have spoken with men who tell me that they know when a woman wants sex, even if she doesn't know it or say it, or that women owe men sex if they spend money on them. Others believe that there are "good girls" who should be treated with decency and respect, and "bad girls" who should not. Sexism, in the form of a cultivated ignorance, perpetuates these myths, which lead men to rape and to excuse each other for raping.

As one comment said, "Communicate, it's key!" Let me offer some concrete suggestions in that area. To women, speak up! Tell him to stop if you don't like it, and warn him in advance if you think he is going to do something you don't want. Don't just hope he will stop if you give "hints." Scream and fight back if he doesn't listen.

Men, don't rape! If a woman says "no," "stop," "leave me alone," then do what she says. I have been told, to my face, "Sometimes women say 'no' when they mean 'yes'." Well, then, what are we supposed to say when we mean "no?" If she is being ambiguous, ask her straight out, "Are you enjoying yourself? Do you want to have sex with me?" Don't tell yourself that this will destroy the mood or ruin things. Honesty and respect can only improve human relationships.

Garfields were wrong about homeless

by Alison Leibold

On Friday, October 6 the college community received a letter from the Garfield Republican Club addressing the Housing Now! Rally and the problem of homelessness in the United States. Before correcting many of the letter's misconceptions, I would like to thank the Garfield Republicans for clarifying a point that is frequently lost in the excitement of such an event -- rallies such as this demonstrate national support for issues not on the national agenda. The rally was not an end in and of itself. The rally is the first step in addressing the problem.

Housing Now! demanded a restoration of the lower income housing budget, which has been slashed 77 percent in the past eight years. The Garfield letter expressed a concern that this would constitute "throwing money at our socio-economic problems...by providing an outlet for our compassion without in fact fulfilling our concerns." I would like to clarify that federal housing funds do not go toward short term relief, but rather strike at the root cause of homelessness. These monies go toward a range of programs that create more housing and more affordable housing for low-income families.

The letter expressed the idea that federal spending is ineffective because "most of the money is squandered and consumed by the vast bureaucracy that arose to take care of the problems for which this money was initially solicited." In actuality, the Department of Housing and Urban Development -- which was the only Reagan department to undergo a significant (25 percent) cut in bureaucratic staff -- showed pervasive waste and scandal. A decrease in bureaucracy does not correlate with an increase in efficiency.

The letter's comment that "when vast sums of public money are placed in the hands of public officials, there is an inherent tendency toward corruption and influence peddling" is a platitude that could easily be applied to all aspects of the federal government that involve spending. While this is a problem which needs to be addressed, the solution is not the cessation of all funds for federal housing.

The three initial proposals are all derived from what is called supply-side theory. Their intent is to stimulate business in the area in the hopes that the profits incurred will "trickle down" to the people whose problems we are attempting to address. This, however, is a strategy that has been empirically proven not to work and that George Bush, in a much-quoted phrase, has called "voodoo economics."

The "elimination of oppressive rent-control laws" is, on the other hand, a proposal that deserves much consideration. However, eliminating them would require their replacement by another mechanism, so that the housing that is being provided for people is within their means. Currently, rent-control laws provide no incentive within the market for affordable housing. If anything, they encourage owners to allow housing to become run down in order to evacuate tenants and lift the rent control. By subsidizing housing, the government could not only allow people to continue purchasing housing at a price that they can afford, but they could provide an incentive within the market for the provision of this housing.

The letter's second suggestion was President Bush's Point of Light Initiative, "a program of national service designed to foster volunteerism in and between communities that need help." Charity, however, is hardly able to provide long-term solutions. Indeed, it serves to encourage what the letter has spoken of as an evil to be avoided: "goes far toward easing middle-class consciences than it does toward easing the problems of poverty."

That private citizens are filling the gap between the current problems and the eventual long-term solutions is admirable. Short-term relief, such as soup kitchens, shelters, clothing and food drives, is necessary if the standard of living for the homeless and the impoverished is to be kept from falling any lower while we wait for long-term solutions to be carried out.

Long-term solutions, however, will come not from volunteers, but from more equitable legislation and from the funding of more affordable housing. The Garfield Republicans have stated that "compassion is measured not in dollars but in commitment," and I agree with them fully. If we are to solve the problem of homelessness in the United States, we have to let the government know that this is what the country is demanding. We need to express our support for this issue both through demonstrations like the Housing Now! rally and through active awareness of and involvement in the establishment of long-term solutions.

In Other Ivory Towers

Wesleyan University

A Wesleyan sophomore caused a washing machine in his dormitory to go directly from the spin cycle into the burn cycle when he overfilled it with clothes last week. While the machine was running, the student heard a loud screeching noise and smelled burning rubber. When he saw thick smoke billowing from the room, he called Public Safety for help. Two engines from the Middletown fire department sped to the scene, and firemen were able to squelch the flames while simultaneously evacuating the building. Apparently, the student had attempted to run his oversized load of wash in one machine, which had shut down, leaving the clothes submerged in water. He then put the entire load into another machine, thus starting the fire. "It's ridiculous," said one dorm resident. "All the machines are either broken down or they break when you put your clothes in them." Maybe it just depends on how much clothing you have.

University of Pennsylvania

The University of Pennsylvania's Poor Richard collection is a little poorer these days, as two books printed by Ben Franklin were stolen from the school's libraries. The books, last seen on August 16, are worth an estimated $60,000. One volume contains two of Franklin's essays on educational philosophy, while the other is the only existing copy of a 1744 catalogue that Franklin used in his second-hand book business. It is believed that a man who signed out the books under the name Greg Williams was able to leave the library with them after replacing them with two volumes of similar appearance. The library is offering a $5000 reward for information leading to the books' recovery.

Dartmouth College

Head north, young college students -- way, way north. Dartmouth College is beginning an exchange program with Greenland. The school's Institute of Arctic Studies is arranging a program that will allow several Dartmouth undergrads to do internships in Greenland in their own fields of study. At the same time, several students from Greenland would be attending Dartmouth. The government of Greenland initially contacted Dartmouth about the possibility of running such a program. They found the school particularly attractive because of its rural environment, expressing hopes that Greenland students would experience minimal culture shock there. Yes, but do they read Playboy in Greenland?

University of California at Berkeley

About 50 students at Berkeley staged a "smoke-in" to protest increasing federal efforts to punish drug users. The students sat on the steps of Sproul Hall and smoked what they claimed were marijuana cigarettes. An eight-foot-long replica of a marijuana cigarette made out of paper and chicken-wire was lit on fire during the demonstration. The group leading the demonstration is known as DOPE, short for Defend Our Personal Ethics.

Mildred Blake: 92 and still learning

by Keith Hedlund

Mildred got up to walk to class on a particularly cold morning. Nothing is unusual about that. Nothing, that is, except that Mildred is 92 years old.

Mildred Blake has been walking over from Park Street to the Science Quad three mornings a week this year to audit Professor of Geology Mark Johnson's Geology 101 course. She has been auditing classes here since she moved to Williams from New York in 1978 to live near her son. She said, "Anybody who comes to live in Williams would be foolish not to take advantage of it."

She, like the other auditors at Williams, sits in on the lectures for free. She doesn't have to turn in any work, but she does do the textbook reading. She sits in the front of the classroom, but said nothing, as has been the custom of most auditors here at Williams. "When I used to audit a class I would sit modestly in the back," she said. "But now, because of my hearing, I brazenly sit up front as if I were an important student. But of course, I'm not."

She said sometimes it is hard to keep quiet, especially "when you know very well the answer to what the professor is asking." She said, "One time I broke my silence. What the professor said was so apt that without thinking I said, as they say in parliament, 'Heart, heart!'"

Usually, however, she will talk to professors after class. "Occasionally I differ sharply with something the professor said," she said. For instance, the professor teaching her American Presidency (Political Science 218) course cast doubt on whether the split of the Republican Party in 1912 actually had caused Woodrow Wilson to be elected. "I told him after class that there was no question that what caused [Wilson's election] was the split in the Republican Party ... I have taken an active political interest in every presidential campaign since 1904 -- every one this century."

"Immense respect for students" Students, she said, are always kind to her, and often help her up and down stairs. Classmate Allison Schepker '93 said, "I hope that at ninety-two I'm as open to growth as she is." Blake said she has "an immense amount of respect for the students, the amount of work they do, and their seriousness about it. When I think how much work I do just attending lectures and during the reading for one course and that students have to write papers and do outside reading in addition to that -- and do it of four courses -- I'm just amazed at and respectful of what they have to do."

Since she took Introduction to Art History (Art History 101) the fall after she moved here, Blake has taken at least one class every fall semester. She has taken the art history course twice and the survey of Shakespeare (English 201) four times, as well as Tudor England (History 323), The American Presidency, and two history courses taught then by President Oakley on the Early Middle Ages and the Protestant Reformation.

She also took two courses at the same time her second semester here. The Psychology of Religion (Religion 301), and Jesus, Moses, and Mohammed (203), which, she said, "sounds like a big swear word." She doesn't take courses in the spring because she spends most of the semester in warmer climates. She always takes a train to get there. "I'm a train buff. I haven't been on a plane since 1940. They tell me its changed quite a bit."

Amherst ranked over Williams in poll

two, or three -- brings us to the attention of [prospective students]."

"Given what I heard about Williams, the poll won't affect my decision about college. The fact that Williams is ranked has something to do with my choice. But it doesn't matter that Swarthmore is number one and Williams third," prospective student Gabe Bauriedel said.

Despite the attention the rankings give schools, Parker has a problem with the way the survey is conducted. He believes that the numerical rankings are not practical because the schools do not all attempt to offer the same things to students. Parker suggested the method of grouping by clusters, ranking the top 10 then the next 20.

"The idea of ranking Williams ahead of Swarthmore or Swarthmore ahead of Amherst or Williams is ridiculous. There are good reasons to go to Amherst over Williams and there are good reasons to go to Williams over Amherst," Parker said.

Most Ephs agreed with Parker and discounted the relevance of the rankings in choosing a school, however many strongly objected to Williams' third place finish. "I saw the survey. I had heard about Williams and it reinforced what I thought about Williams. But it didn't influence my decision," Ethan Marin '93 said. "I can't see how Swarthmore or Amherst can be above Williams. But making rankings like this on an objective basis is impossible, so I don't put much faith in them."

"You couldn't pay me enough to go to Swarthmore, and I can't believe Amherst beat us," Jay Venkatesan '93 said.

Amherst ranked first among liberal arts colleges in academic reputation, student selectivity and retention patterns and second in financial resources. But Amherst faculty was ranked eleventh, dropping the Little Three school behind Swarthmore, which ranked first in faculty quality and financial resources.

"I think it's kind of funny that their faculty is eleventh. I wonder how their faculty is reacting to it," Parker said.

Bryn Mawr College finished third in faculty, behind Williams and Swarthmore, and tied with Wellesley College for fifth overall. On the strength of its financial resources, in which it was third, Pomona College finished fourth overall. Smith College, Wesleyan University, Dberlin College and Grinnell College (Iowa) rounded out the top 10 liberal arts colleges.

In the same issue, U.S. News ranked the top universities in the United States. Yale University was the top-ranked school in this category, followed by Princeton, Harvard, Duke, California Institute of Technology, Stanford, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Dartmouth College, the University of Chicago and Rice. The University of California-Berkeley was the top-ranked public school at thirteenth, followed by UCLA (16), the University of Michigan (17) and the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill (18).

Dental dams are here to stay

by Dan Silverman

A dental dam is a lot like a nuclear reactor. Most people on the Williams campus have heard of the device but not too many have seen one, used one, or know all that much about one.

Freshmen whose entries have been visited by Peer Health representatives know all about dental dams. Most upperclassmen, however, have only vague ideas about the enigma that is the dental dam.

"Most upperclassmen have never seen [dental dams] and many don't know what they are," Pam Volpe '91, a Peer Health director, said.

When asked about dental dams people usually laugh nervously or just give a strange look. There seems to be a general curiosity about the dams but no one likes to talk about them directly. As a result, the little plastic sheets have been surrounded with an increasing air of mystery.

One junior, when asked how a dental dam was used, snickered. "One can only imagine."

A freshman male sitting at a table with two females said he knew all about dental dams but said, "I'd rather not discuss it in mixed company."

Why don't people who have heard so much about dental dams like to talk about them? Why have Williams students heard about dental dams?

Last spring the dental dam became a focus of particular attention. It was announced that for Sexual Awareness Week the device would be distributed to every S.U. box as a part of safe sex kit containing a dam, condoms, rubber gloves and a lubricant. This project, the brainchild of Kristin Hudson '91, was a way this year, was scrapped when it was thought that the kits would probably be wasted or thrown out.

The decision not to send out the safe sex kits left the Peer Health center with two thousand dental dams and two thousand curious students. The words "dental dam" were thus common around the college, but only a few people were certain what the device actually is.

What is a dental dam?

A dental dam is a square piece of latex (a bit thicker than a condom) that is used to prevent the transmission of disease during oral sex. It is primarily intended for use as a barrier between the mouth of the person performing oral sex and a female upon whom oral sex is being performed. A dental dam can also be used as a means of oral protection when practicing stimulation and theoretically as protection when performing oral sex on a male although a condom is recommended in the latter.

A dental dam can provide hydroelectric power, but as a means of protection the dental dam is one of the most effective tools in the fight against diseases like AIDS. It is a necessary precaution because although it is not believed to be a source or receptacle for the virus.

Peer Health will provide a dental dam free of charge in any interested student who comes to its walk-in hours from 7 to 9 p.m. every Monday and Thursday. The Peer Health office is located in the basement of Baxter Hall, just past the Williams Ours Club reading room.

This seemingly innocuous piece of latex is a dental dam, a device well-known but little understood on campus. (Thumas)

"KAOS was very disorganized last year," Elliott said. He said that was WARP's main reason for absorbing KAOS. "We thought we could do a better job of organizing it."

Elliott said that last year's KAOS had not been very well publicized and that this year WARP had College Council funding to "massively publicize" the game on campus. He said also that by organizing KAOS under WARP it would lend the game some continuity.

"What usually happens is that the previous year's winner runs it. It's whoever wants to run it, whoever's willing to run it runs it. This year the winner from last year's game, Tom Dupree, is running it under WARP," Elliott said.

Last year's KAOS coordinator said, "It was disorganized last year. That was pure circumstance. The guy who ran it [prior to last year] was a senior and he decided at the end of December not to run it when actually you need to start work on it in like October or November. Basically I had two weeks to do everything. I didn't have time to get it all together. I did everything as best as I could."

He said that since he had more time to prepare, KAOS would be more organized this year. He said he does not plan to turn KAOS control over to WARP.

"Hopefully I beat them to it." "There probably will be two games. I hope not. The existence of more than one game will take away from KAOS."

don't think there's enough participation to maintain two games. I put out applications in the freshmen's boxes, so hopefully I beat them to it," last year's KAOS coordinator said.

WARP also refuses to surrender KAOS control. "When we filed for College Council recognition, KAOS was one of the things we listed as under WARP," Elliott said. "We have last year's winner and we have College Council recognition. We are still running KAOS."

WARP member Tom Dupree '92, who is coordinating WARP's KAOS game, said, "I'm not interested in fighting the legal battles over KAOS. I hope that this can be worked out peacefully and that there won't be two games running because that would really be chaos."

able -- when you can hear it ... Both men and women need training on how to speak to a room full of people so that they can be heard. ... If there's one course that Williams college should offer, it is public speaking freshman year. ... I know it's not just my hearing, because often when a student said something, there is laughter only on one side of the room." She sat straight up and said forcefully, "They don't recognize that you must start at a higher pitch. ... [They] speak as if they're talking across a testable."

Milo-what?

An English major in college, she is still interested in subjects such as the mitochondria living within human cells and has been reading on related topics for fifteen or twenty years. "It fascinates me to think that we're a host for thousands of tiny microscopic creatures."

She adds, "Professors generally welcome auditors because they introduce to the class people who enjoy the subject for reasons other than career ... You're making a statement that 'This is an interesting thing to know.' ... For this reason she feels that as an auditor she has a responsibility to come to class every day. "Your statement is a little bit defective if you frequently miss the lecture."

She also might be an ideal spokesperson for the concept of continued education. "As soon as I left college I immediately began to read the books the head of the English department had looked down upon because they were too sexually explicit. All he told me about Whitman was that he said, 'I sound my barbaric yelp over the roofs of the world.' I began to read the things that college had left out. ... I think that you should get from a college education that you will become a person that will add to your education all your life."

Blake said that she would like students to have a greater appreciation of civic responsibility. "The people who have a college education in America," she said, "have never had a greater civic responsibility than they do today, a day in which the standards the White House has set are so low, and a day in which everything is global, but there remains no global concern for law, order, justice, [or] government. We need to catch up. The world is perishing for lack of them."

by Jodi Arleil

What do a turn-of-the-century anarchist, an aspiring writer, a woman who has been asleep for 29 years, a deathly ill oriental woman, and a pair of girls who "just want to get away from it all" have in common? They can all be seen in "Contemporary Works IV," a series of five one-act plays showing from October 16 to 21 in Adams Memorial Theatre.

"Emma Goldman: Love, Anarchy, and Other Affairs" was written by Jessica Litwak. This play is perhaps the best of the five. It is primarily a one-woman monologue with occasional punctuating remarks by the announcer, played by Ben Lewis '92.

Guion Garcia '91 is compelling as the courageous idealist Emma Goldman. She tells the story of her own life, completely and forthrightly, as if the audience is a trusted confidante. Garcia portrays Goldman as a woman worthy of admiration. She successfully shows Goldman's infectious passion for life and unswerving dedication to her political beliefs.

Of all the actors involved in these plays, the one who shows the most versatility is Doug Camp '91, who plays three characters, Willy, Max, and Missy, in Lavonne Mueller's "Colette in Love," also one of the better plays. Willy is Colette's (Melissa Levine '90) ex-husband and editor. Max is her extravagant lover, and Missy is a friend.

Colette herself is a brash young woman who sings and dances in a nightclub, but is determined to make her own way as a writer in New York. The story revolves around her relationships with these three men and her unflappable determination to be independent.

Camp's portrayal of the three male characters works, by putting the emphasis on the character of Colette and her relationships with men in general. Camp is able to make the characters different enough to avoid the confusion that could result from this type of casting.

"Candy and Shelley Go to the Desert," by Paula Cizmar, is the remaining play of the first series. Two friends from the East set off on a vacation to the West Coast. Shelley, a city slicker, is played by Nicole Feret '92 and Candy, a country girl, is played by Allison Achauer '93. Along the way, somewhere in the middle of the southwestern desert, their car overheats.

The play attempts to show what happens to the young women when they are outside society. To emphasize this, the stage is only shown as the desert, and other action occurs off-stage. Their setting allows them to explore their friendship and make personal revelations.

Allison Achauer '93 as Candy and Nicole Feret '92 as Shelley are stranded in a desert when their car breaks down in "Candy and Shelley Go to the Desert," one of the one-act plays in "Contemporary Works IV," which will be in DownStage this week.

"Candy and Shelley" is less effective than it could be, however, because the actors put such an emotional emphasis on inconsequential details that those aspects that should stand out are lost. Largely due to the script, this play does not seem as true as the others.

Unfortunately, the script also seems marred by female stereotypes. The women's conflict revolves around a man, and they are finally united with the appearance of Ran (Dan Perkins '90). Perkins is a positive note in the play; he makes his character, a confused hiker, the most believable element of the play.

In the play by Harold Pinter, "A Kind of Alaska" is a description of the consequences of a 29-year sleep. These consequences are shown in the story of Deborah (Jennifer Whitchard '90), a woman who was struck with a sleeping disease at the age of 16 from which she does not awaken until now, at the age of 45. Hikaru is believable in the part of a middle-aged woman with the mind and memories of a teenager. She also seems very realistic when showing the disorientation of a person just waking up from a 29-year nap.

The job of bringing her up to date falls upon her sister Pauline (Alice Maurice '90) and her doctor, Hornby (Tom Janiewicz '92). These two are simpler characters and, while well acted, are not as convincing as Deborah.

The most unusual of the five plays is "The Lady Aoi," by Yukio Mishima, a modern interpretation of the ancient art of oriental No theater. The starkly different mood of this play is set from the beginning, when two people dressed all in black appear. They mark off a square in which the action will occur and set up incense at the corners of the stage.

(Abigail Solomon '92) in the hospital. Aoi is unconscious throughout the entire play. Hikaru's visit takes place late at night, and during the course of the visit two women attempt to seduce him: the night nurse and the spirit of his former lover Yasuko Kojiki, who wants to regain his love.

Yasuko's says her purpose in being there is to bring flowers to Aoi, "flowers of pain, invisible buds that will open into ash-colored blooms." She is able to affect Aoi through her dreams, causing her to moan and writhe in pain.

The acting is very stylized and almost stiff in execution, but it works with the Twilight Zone-esque plotline. The play makes use of speeches, in which a single character stands stiffly and speaks in a monotone about his or her feelings. Fortunately the actors are able to successfully carry off this unusual play, and easily move back and forth from the very formal parts to a more relaxed mode of speech.

Freedom: Young's strongest album in a decade

by Christopher Lawrence

Neil Young -- Freedom (Reprise Records)

Neil Young has always had an exceptional sense of the past. A current of nostalgic longing runs through his best work and has enabled him to draw stark contrasts with what often appears to be a dark and depressing present. His latest record, Freedom, is easily his strongest set of music in a decade. It is only named by the way the nostalgia seems to extend to the artist's own classic work.

1979's Rust Never Sleeps opened with the acoustic "My Hey Hey" and closed with a searing electric version of the same song. Similarly, Freedom is framed by twin versions of "Rockin' in the Free World." It's an excellent song loaded with the insistent anger and bitterness of "Ohio" or "Tonight's the Night."

Young introduces the child of a crack-addicted mother and notes: "That's one more kid that will never go to school! Never get to fall in love! Never get to be cool!" The song is a less-than-gentle nudge at the listener, intended to challenge the self-absorption of the Reagan-era. The frenzied guitar assault of the reprise version serves as a climactic call to arms -- the demand that the children of the Eighties and Nineties abandon the complacency and materialism which might consume them.

Young urges a second look at what passes for freedom in our latter-day glaze and age. Several of the songs were recorded in New York with a basic guitar-bass-drums power trio similar to Crazy Horse. The stark striking of these is the acidic reworking of the Drifters' classic "On Broadway."

A terse reading of the song's famous lines yields to guitar grunge punctuated by howls of "give me that crack." The attempt is a long shot, but it works, thanks to the muscle and passion of Young, drummer Chad Cromwell, and bassist Rick Rojas. "On Broadway" and its companion, "Don't Cry," ooze the pain and anguish that characterizes Neil Young's best electric music.

Even as he is essaying urban decay, Young manages to turn some of the trademark country-pop which made CSNY superstars. Linda Ronstadt helps out on "Hangin' On a Limb" and "The Ways of Love," two delicate ballads which recall 1972's famous query: "are you ready for the country?"

The music and the vocals are sweet and clean in a way that contrasts sharply with the metallic filth of "On Broadway." By offering reminders of the past, Young suggests that the country offers the best chance for the purity and honesty which fight the doom and injustice of the cities.

All is not well however, even in the heartland. The reading of "Too Far Gone" is following the same path as the destitute rocker of 1975's "Albuquerque." The similarity of the songs carries a heavy weight. In creating Freedom, Young has to some extent anthologized his best work. The ideas that made Tonight's the Night a grim update on the fall of the counterculture are here. So are the ones that made Rust Never Sleeps an affirmation of artistic integrity. They are still good, and they become vehicles for great songs worth hearing about. All the same, it is hard not to miss the conceptual unity of the earlier works.

For all his apparent flakiness, Young managed to pull his contrasts (rural-urban, past-present, acoustic-electric) into coherent album-length commentary. Freedom is composed of great songs, but it is only a collection. Ultimately, it falls short of being the major artistic statement of which he is capable.

Neil Young has proven that he can still be Neil Young. After the bizarre chameleon-like stylistic shifts and a largely failed CSNY reunion, that proof is more than welcome. The loner leaves us waiting for his next challenge. Freedom indicates that the wait will be worthwhile.

Chucklehead to bring funk-rap to Williams

by Tammie Smith

Get ready, Williams College, for what just may be the dance party of the fall. Next Saturday, Chucklehead and the Bozo Patrol Horns will be shaking Mission Park with their funk-rap music, brought to you by the houses of Greylock and S.A.C.

Tanel Miringoff '91, the president of Carter House, said, "This is a great chance to hear a really different kind of band. They're one of the hottest bands on the college circuit this fall. We had trouble booking them because they're really in demand."

Chucklehead consists of Eken Levy, guitar and vocals, Erik Atkinson, drums and vocals, Brian Gottesman, keyboard and vocals, Dave Rengel, bass, Huck Benner, baritone sax, guitar, and vocals, Len Alkins, tenor sax and vocals, John Ray Schachter, trumpet and vocals, and Roh Nahi, alto sax and vocals.

"Basically the music itself is a complete hybrid. It's really true -- we don't sound like anyone else. There's a certain crazy, absurdist, schizo quality that we go for. The rhythm is rap, but ultimately we're a funk band," Levy said.

"It's son of like rap music in that we borrow and add from a lot of other songs, put them in a completely different context and change what they mean. We present a very twisted world view. The keyboardist plays samples from all over the world, things like credit card ads, even," he continued.

Chucklehead was formed last October. The group uses chants and dance moves to bring in audience participation. Levy said, "We try to get the audience heavily involved. It's functional music. It's meant to be danced to. We feel like the success of a gig depends on how many people danced or for how long, not how much money we get or how many people come."

Tunes to listen for on Saturday include "Gilligan's Bush," a song about George Bush, Dan Quayle, and Gilligan, "Pichikorie Buggin'," "Muppets in the Corn," and "Jocopyard," a song about the game show "Jeopardy" that turns into a confession of an obsession with game shows. WCFM may be playing demo's this week.

"It's twisted stuff. It's funny, but it also says something about the culture at the same time. It's not peace music -- that can be such a drag at times. We use a lot of double entendres and don't tell you everything; we let you figure out what it means. We get heavily into the absurd, but there's a certain point at which the absurdity means something," Levy said.

Chucklehead and the Bozo Patrol Horns, sponsored by S.A.C., and the houses of Greylock, will be performing in Mission Dining Hall on Saturday.

ber, Schachter and Alkins are from the Boston area, where the group is headquartered, and the other members went to or are going to Wesleyan.

"We see the band as our career," Levy said. Currently Chucklehead is popular in the Boston club scene, where they can often be heard at Club Ill in Somerville. "We're very excited about coming to Williams. We love playing schools. The main thing is that we just want people to shake their booties and have

Abortion rights advocates win victories

The Abortion rights movement won an encouraging victory in the Florida legislature last week. The state, which has had a history of strong support for anti-abortion laws, voted down six restrictive proposals offered by Governor Bob Martinez. State Representative Robert Shelley, who reversed his position from anti-abortion to pro-choice, cited the Supreme Court decision in Webster v. Reproductive Health Services over the summer, which gave more power to the states in determining the legality of abortion, as the key factor in the switch in opinion. He noted the surge of a "silent majority" who disdained the idea of government interference in personal decisions. Next month, the issue will go before the Pennsylvania legislature, which has been firmly anti-abortion, thus far has shown no signs of reversing its position.

Fed aims at preventing Wall Street panic

In response to Friday's market plunge of 190.58 points (a 6.9 percent plunge in the value of the Dow Jones Industrial Average), the Federal Reserve Board is keeping close contact with international market officials in an effort to assure investors that it has adequate funds to meet any sudden monetary demands which might result. All this is in an effort to prevent a similar plunge of that previous Friday. Officials say that there is a difference in the seriousness of this drop, which is limited to merger and acquisition-related stocks, as opposed to 1987's all-encompassing plummet. Friday's plunge was in response to the failure of the UAL Corporation to complete financing for its intended $6.75 billion buyout of United Airlines. No one predicted any long-term effect on the economy's condition as a result of Friday's events.

Congress won't bite the budget bullet

The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings budget law came under attack this week as Congress failed to complete a budget bill to meet deficit reduction requirements. The law sets specific deficit targets for each fiscal year until 1991, and provides that if requirements are not met, spending cuts are automatic, with Social Security only immune. Senior House Democrats are looking into possible changes in the law, including possible exclusion of the uncollectable Social Security surplus from the Office of Management and Budget account forecasting. As the law stands, deficit targets refer only to projected figures rather than to the actual deficit, allowing for serious understatement of the deficit problem. The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law has been in effect for four years, and this has been the first year that Congress has not met the target.

Three drug traffickers extradited from Colombia

Three suspected low level drug traffickers were extradited to the United States from Bogotá, Colombia on Saturday to face federal charges in Florida and Michigan. None were among the twelve most-wanted by United States officials. Controversy abounds as to the actual importance of extraditing these individuals, and others like them, to stopping the drug war in Colombia. Colombian authorities are concentrating on the capture of two major drug barons, Pablo Escobar Gaviria and Jose Gonzalo Rodriguez Gacha, offering $250,000 in reward money for their arrest. The three lower level traffickers were charged Monday with a variety of counts, from conspiring to import and distribute cocaine to actual drug smuggling. The Colombian drug war is now nine weeks old, claiming at least ten lives and leaving 150 others wounded.

Biggest anti-apartheid demonstrations ever in S. Africa

Demonstrators marched on Saturday in towns across South Africa in mass protest against apartheid, as well as in celebration of the promised release by President F.W. de Klerk of political prisoners. Over 150,000 participated in perhaps the largest demonstration against apartheid ever, but there came no word of when the prisoners would actually be freed. The march was called by the Congress of South African Trade Unions, the largest primarily black union, in opposition to a proposed amendment to a labor relations law. Most of the prisoners, including 77-year-old Walter Sisulu, have been in jail for at least twenty-five years. They were convicted of the same treason and sabotage charges as Nelson Mandela, who still awaits announcement of his release.

50 Hours: a new core proposal

World: a one-year course that explores ways in which the social sciences have been used to explain political, economic and social life, as well as the experience of individuals, in the last 200 years.

Time for a major?
According to an NEH chart of a typical student's coursework for four years, this core takes up 16 of 40 semesters, or 40 percent of a four-year student's college career (assuming five courses per semester; the report gives no alternative for different course schedules).

The courses are split between the first three years, leaving the senior year open, presumably for major courses. However, at schools where students declare a major early (sophomore, or even late freshman year), the core would take time away from classes in a chosen concentration.

Another recommendation of 50 Hours is that students in the core be taught in small classes and "in an interested fashion, so that, for example, students reading Descartes' philosophy in a Western civilization course are reminded of his

Federal rules ask financial aid officers to play drug cops

by Tom Dupree

Although recently pitted as adversaries, the federal government and the Williams College Office of Financial Aid have joined forces in another matter: the war on drugs.

Earlier this year, students receiving federal money through the Department of Education's Pell Grant program signed oaths stating that they are and will remain drug-free. The federal government is depending on college officials to enforce these oaths and to report violations.

The Pell Grant provides a maximum of $2,300 in financial aid to students. There are approximately 200 Williams students currently receiving Pell Grant money.

The Pell Grant drug oath is a provision of the Drug-Free Workplace Act. It requires the students to avoid engaging in "the unlawful manufacture, distribution, dispensation, or use of any controlled substance" while accepting federal aid.

Violators are subject to loss of grant money as well as prosecution for fraud—making false statements to obtain federal money. If convicted of fraud, the student could face a $10,000 fine and a jail sentence.

'Will report a conviction'
According to Director of Financial Aid Phil Wick, Williams will comply contributions to mathematics." This presents several problems. The first is the idea of small classes: Introductory, survey courses are notoriously large, not because colleges and universities necessarily want them that way, but because of the realities of faculty size and organization.

For instance, if every freshman at Williams were required to take a core similar to this, and assuming 20 students is a good number for a "small" class, that means 25 extra classes each semester. Even at larger universities, this would rapidly become an impossible situation. In addition, with a critical shortage of faculty predicted for the 1990s, filling these slots in the semester will be very difficult. With federal and state aid to schools decreasing, there is almost no way most schools could do this.

Fortunately, Williams is in a far superior situation to most schools, in that the great majority of its students have the knowledge which NEH says is lacking. But other schools do not have the same resources, nor do they recruit from the same caliber of high school students. This brings up another unusual aspect of 50 Hours. It chooses to attack the problem of general knowledge at the college level, where the influence of the federal government is not all that strong. It would seem that high school would be a much better arena for general survey courses. It appears that NEH has pretty much given up on secondary schools as a place to disseminate knowledge.

Previous works from former Secretary of Education William Bennett and other officials in the Department of Education discuss the importance for a core curriculum in high schools. The federal government likes the idea of a core curriculum, but seems unsure exactly where it should be implemented.

And that is what comes across in 50 Hours. A lot of research went into putting the suggested core together. But, like other reports on the sorry state of education in the United States, 50 Hours doesn't so much suggest a plan of action as much as it asks the question "Wouldn't it be great if...?"

A-side ruggers taste first win of season, defeat Norwich

by Chris Blackburn

Indian summer came to the Berkshires this weekend, providing good weather—little wind and rain last Saturday afternoon—for the WFC's game against Norwich. The Williams A-side, coming off two losses to tremendous rugby clubs, was more than ready for what the Armadillos

The play swayed back and forth for the remainder of the half, and a penalty kick under the posts called by the Scots referee allowed Chsp "my party" Petersen '90 to put the Dogs up 7-4 at the half.

The second half began, and it was as though someone had lit a torch under the A-side. Frisky, dazzling loose play and dominance in the scrum equalled, as it must, (and as it has before for the A-side) many scoring opportunities. Two tries by Scott "scooter" Brown, one on a crashing run through five unfortunate "wick" ruggers, and tries by Peterson and the Scrum accounted for the scoring in the remainder of the match. Crafty play by Pete "soft side" Stewart and the Williams loose three gave the A's a tactical capability lacking in previous matches, and the Norwich side was left flat-footed. Williams won their first match of the season by a final score of 29-4.

The drowsy White Dogs were shocked aware by an early Norwich try that made the score 4-0.

could offer. The first half was played fairly tightly as Norwich tested the revamped Williams line with bruising running. The drowsy White Dogs were shocked aware by an early Norwich try that made the score 4-0. Williams then increased their level of play, playing solid possession rugby that paid off with a try for Sal Vasi '91 that tied the score.

The killer B's, their usual role of club redeemer spoiled by the A-side's tremendous victory, sensed a challenge in the wind. In the tryfest that ensued, which Williams won 26-0, the B-side played better than in last week's victorious victory over Holy Cross. It was a story of fifteen-as-one rugby, as junior Tim Morgan's sixty yard dash for a score was nearly complemented by junior Bill Weiss's bruising inside run for another four points. The scrum was not to be let out, as they drove in a 5-meter scrumpage that Whitney "love hurts" Wilson '90 touched down.

The contest was never truly in doubt for the B-side, despite the Norwich's size advantage, and for the entire second half they changed to a more aerial attack. Booming kicks by Dan "peace and harmony" Foote '90 and Colin Holley

by Eric Chiu

On a dark, overcast Sunday this month, the men's crew team entered their first regatta at Middletown, Connecticut, on the Connecticut River. The October 8th Regatta of the Connecticut was a 3.5-mile race against the clock in a variety of rowing categories.

The Ephs entered the race with weeks of dedicated training behind them: long afternoons of constant drills, penetrating rain, and fog were standard fare. The training apparently paid off.

The freshmen rowed two boats in the race, finishing fourth and fourteenth out of a total of twenty-two entries. The first Williams boat came in second with the time of 19:15.20, trailing SUNY Maritime, which finished in first place with 18:23.45.

Williams entered two eight-man boats in the Varsity Intermediate 8 Event. Williams placed second place last year by finishing eleven seconds behind Northeastern's Junior Varsity crew. This year, the Ephs repeated victory, once again placing second behind Northeastern's JV crew. The Williams boat finished a close second with a time of 16:48.03, mere 2.39 seconds behind the Northeastern A-boat's 16:45.64. The second Williams boat in the event finished twenty-second out of thirty-eight. Williams entered a varsity boat in the Lightweight Event, composed of upperclassmen and freshmen. Handicapped by the fact that several athletes were fatigued from a previous race, the Ephs finished twenty-third out of twenty-nine. The next important event to watch for is the Head of the Charles Regatta in Boston, Massachusetts, coming up this Sunday. The regatta is the largest Head race in the world and will attract thousands of crew teams from all over the United States as well as from abroad. The Williams men's and women's crews teams hope to make a strong showing, with six eight-person boats in the race.

play on the drive was a 15-yard completion from Dwyer to Hen on third-and-12 from the Bates 40. After the defense stopped the Bobcats without a first down, it took Dwyer only three plays to find Moynahan all alone downfield for a 42-yard touchdown pass.

Erase that goose egg
But Bates got onto the scoreboard by blocking the Williams point after attempt. Bates defensive back Gary Abagnano picked up the block and ran 90 yards the other way for two points.

"That was the first time that had ever happened to us and it swung the momentum," said Farley. "It revved them up quite a bit." Eleven plays later, Bates had put the ball into the Williams end zone after a 51-yard drive. Before the conversion attempt Bates called timeout and decided to try for two points.

The Bobcats successfully completed the conversion but, in the melee that ensued, Eph Ted Rogers '91, Bates's top running back Jeff Bochenek and a starting Bobcat offensive lineman were ejected from the game for fighting. Rogers, the Ephs' leading scorer and sack leader entered the game, was replaced by Dan Yerna '90.

"Teddy thought there was a late hit and he hit back. One of their guys jumped into the fray and all three were thrown out," said Farley. "Twenty-two penalties in a college football game is a little embarrassing. There was frustration on the Bates side but we lowered our standards by talking back and hitting back."

The Eph offense then stalled and the Bobcats had one final chance to score before halftime. Bates used seven plays to get the ball to the Eph 30, but, before Bates could score, Week intercepted an Ed Travers pass at the Williams 21.

Ephs reassert themselves
The teams traded possessions twice before Williams was in position to score again. Gilmarin returned a punt 52 yards to the Bates 23 to set up the score. Two Chesley carries gained 13 yards and Hen carried for nine to get the ball to the end. Dwyer scored on a quarterback sneak from there.

"Gilmarin made things happen on the punt return. We haven't had anything like that happen in a long time," Farley said.

The touchdown put Williams up 34-10 and the game was never really contested after that.

The team garnered other honors this week besides the Bates win: quarterback Dan Dwyer '92 was named NESAC Offensive Player of the Week and ECAC Rookie of the Week for October 7's Trinity game, while defensive end Ted Rogers '91 was named ECAC New England Defensive Player of the Week as well as NESAC Defensive Player of the Week for his part in the Trinity game.

The Bates win also raised Williams to 4-0 going into this Saturday's game against Colby (1-3), who defeated Wesleyan 39-6 last Saturday.

"With the big win over Wesleyan, Colby has to be expected to be up for us," Farley said. "I don't know what happened to them early in the year. They were expected to be up there with us and Trinity and Hamilton."

W. tennis sees record drop with loss to Jeffs

by Dan Silverman

Emotionally and physically, it was an up and down week for Williams women's tennis as they crushed Union 9-0 on Thursday but lost to Amherst 6-3 on Saturday.

The Ephs were riding high coming into the Amherst match, as they had a 8-2 record. They may have been a little too high, however, to get the win that would give them the Little Three Championship. "Their hearts were there in the match but they were just a little too tight," Eph coach Gail Ramsay said.

The result was some tentative play and tough losses for the Williams women. The Ephs were able to earn two victories in six singles matches. Penny Foss '93 remained undefeated for the season with a 6-0, 6-0 win in number two singles and Lisa Brayton '91 won her number four singles match 6-4, 6-0. The Ephs needed to sweep the three doubles matches to take the match and the Little Three crown. "Going into the doubles 4-2 I thought we could win it," Coach Ramsay said after the match.

Captain Amy Davidson '90 and Beth Laxson '91 teamed up for a well-played win in number one doubles. The Eph pair were crafty in the first set, taking the fourth game by faking a switch of positions after Laxson's serve. Anticipating a switch the Amherst team tried a low lob into the open court only to find Laxson there for an easy put away. The Ephs went on to break the Amherst team in the fifth game and won the set 6-4. The second set was all the Jeffs, tagged with solid serves and volleys winning 6-2.

Williams, however, dropped the number two and three doubles matches and lost the match 6-3. The up side of the week for Williams tennis fans was Thursday's devastating win over Union. The Ephs dropped only nine games in the six singles matches. Spectators also got a look at good tennis from some different Williams doubles teams.

Kristin Forbes '92 and Abigail Lash '92 paired up for a 6-1, 6-2 win in number one doubles. Stephanie Salmon '92 and Allison Meade '93 won a two-set match with a tiebreaker at number two and juniors Ashley Clancy and Sophie Muir teamed up for a 6-2, 6-1 win at number three.

Cosch Ramsay said the Ephs will have what should be their toughest match of the year in their regular season finale against Skidmore on Tuesday. A win against Skidmore could be the key to building momentum for this weekend's New England Championships at Amherst.

Women's soccer dominates game, but fails to beat Jeffs

by Kerr Houston

The trouble with sports is that the better team doesn't always wind up on top. Upsets are the lifeblood of athletics, but it can be annoying when a team that has obviously been outplayed somehow stumbles its way to the fat end of the final score. The Williams women's soccer squad found out how frustrating such an affair can be on Saturday, when they completely outplayed visiting Amherst but wound up dressing quickly after a 1-0 loss which left the squad with a 5-5 mark.

The Ephwomen controlled the tone of the contest from start to finish, pounding out 20 shots and keeping the ball in Lady Jeff turf for the majority of the wet afternoon.

Liz Nasser '92 pointed out, "I think that we dominated the whole game. But we've been having trouble scoring all year." A conservative Amherst game plan only made it tougher for the Ephwomen, as the Williams offense stalled in mismatched play.

Nonetheless, it appeared for most of the opening frame that the Ephwomen would be celebrating at the final buzzer, as several solid scoring chances had Lady Jeff keeper Jane Hummer on her toes. With 17 minutes elapsed, a shot off the side of Nasser's foot found its way to senior Kelly Collins in front of the net, but a nice Amherst tackle broke up Collins' volley.

Several corner kicks at the 68:00 mark tested the Amherst defense, but weak shots either trickled wide or into Hummer's hands. Jon Plinsky '92 provided some fireworks near the end of the first half, sending some nice diagonal through balls to Nasser, but the Amherst defense held tight.

Second stanza: nothing new

The second half saw few changes in game plan for either side, as Amherst continued to play out of a defensive shell, managing only occasional counterattacks, and the Ephwomen stuck to long balls to the corners and some solid runs down the wings. The Ephwomen saw one of their best opportunities of the day go by the wayside with 28:45 remaining, as Nasser popped a rebound from 12 yards out, only to see it blocked by a clumsy horde of Lady Jeff defenders.

With just over eight minutes left in the game, junior sweeper Curtin Cole, in the midst of a terrific game, tried to up the team's intensity, yelling, "give everything you have now, Williams!" Unfortunately, her cry seemed to inspire the wrong squad, as Amherst's Hope Eighty found herself 18 yards away from the Williams net at the 6:40 mark, and lofted a soft shot off the outstretched hands of Eph keeper Sara Treworgy '93 and into the Williams goal for a 1-0 lead. Nasser later noted that "we made one mental mistake and they scored, and that's how the whole season's been going."

Too little, too late

The Ephwomen responded with fiery play, but crisp shots by Collins and Cole went wide, and Hummer, who turned in 14 saves on the afternoon, held tight on several corner kicks. Accordingly, the game ended with the Ephwomen shaking their heads and the Amherst coach noting that "we were lucky. But we'll take it."

Earlier in the week, the Ephwomen were able to take one of their own, as they downed an inferior Union squad 2-0 on tallies by Collins and Lynn Brenner '90. Nasser, looking back, said that "we really dominated and went to all the balls. They weren't really ever in the game."

Although the Ephwomen have seen any playoff hopes evaporate, they will try to put some life into their offense this week as they travel to Connecticut College today, and return home to face Tufts on Saturday.

Williams Ultimate Frisbee among top 16 in Northeast

by Aaric Eisenstein

At Division I Regionals last weekend, WUFO's fall season came to a close. Qualifying for the tournament based on last week's success at Regionals, the team garnered a top 16 ranking.

The day started with an intense challenge. The tournament bracket pitted WUFO against the number two seeded Titanic, a club team composed of people who have been playing for 8-10 years and which is a contender for the national championship. WUFO established an early lead, forcing Titanic to come from behind for the eventual victory. Tremendous defensive interceptions from Kevin Conroy '90 convinced Titanic that they were going to have to be more careful with their kicking style of play. Brian Cameron '90 spent many a fine moment horizontal in the air, blocking Titanic's passes. Fine defensive play simply wasn't sufficient. Despite the lateral connection of Jim Adams '90 to John Adams '92, WUFO couldn't mount a concerted offensive drive. Much of this weakness was due to an absence of several players because of GRE's and injuries. WUFO was able to work the disc up the field reasonably well, but didn't have the marblelike consistency of their opponents. The game ended 15-5.

In the consolation bracket, WUFO faced Home. This was a team that had beat Williams in a very tight contest the previous week; naturally, WUFO wanted to even the score. WUFO seemed dispirited after the loss to Titanic and although their mechanics were good, the team just couldn't rally at the end. Shelling offensive efforts were delivered by Matt Levin '90 and Neal Lindeman '90 who, together with Conroy, formed an unbroken line of passes from one end of the field to the other. Defensive contributions from Marcelo DaSilva '89 and Mike Van Lent '91 created a number of opportunities for Williams scores. As the end of the game approached, WUFO had a slight lead. But an injury to John Adams rattled Williams and they were outscored for a 15-12 loss, their second close loss in two weeks. The outcome of the game inspired captain Jim Adams to note, "WUFO plays real hard and stomps, and besides that we're very attractive and wonderful people." A more fitting epithet for the season can't be imagined.

Hall, Williams fourth and fifth scorers, both with strong kicks to the finish, maintained their positions well ahead of Bowdoin's fifth woman.

A near photo finish Bowdoin's first runner speeded passed Platt in the last 300 yards of the race, but Platt, leading her team to another NES-CAC title, crossed the line only two seconds behind her, placing an impressive second among the 73 competitors in 18:51. Martin, Williams' second runner, completed the 3.1-mile course in 19:14, placing sixth overall for the Ephs. Macauley, who ran throughout the race with Martin, crossed the line at her heels in seventh place. Wilburn, who also ran much of the race with Martin and Macauley, raced to 11th place in 19:24 while Hall rounded out Williams scoring in 13th place. Jennifer Raney '93 and Andrea Cady '92 formed the rest of the unbeat Williams seven. With the Williams mascot bear once again restored to its owners, the men's team also competed at Amherst Saturday. However, plagued by injury and illness, they lost three of their seven competitors when Marc Beitz '91, Dylan Cooper '91, and Tony Werner '92 were forced to drop out during the race. All three men ran in the top 10 early in the race.

Although they did not score as a team, four Ephs completed the hilly Amherst course in good form. Brian Coan '92, Williams top finisher Saturday, continues to run consistently better in each scoring opportunities. "We were out-playing them," Calichman said, "and after they took the lead we really pushed hard to score." Williams turned up the offensive pressure a notch but could not tie the game, as Stern and Lake both put shots just over the net in the final minutes. Even with this loss, and the one earlier in the road string to Division II Springfield, the Ephs remain undefeated in Division III action.

Hennig's record on the season now stands at 2-2, but this is deceiving since he has given up only two goals in the four games. Russo's system of alternating his goalkeepers has, by chance, given the Ephs their toughest opponents thus far. The Ephs have only scored three goals in front of Hennig, and he has not played at Cole Field.

The Ephs' unblemished 7-0 Division III record will next be tested in a home game against the Tufts Jumbos on Saturday.

Women rugburs hold Division I Vermont to a scoreless tie

by Kristin Moomaw

Women's Rugby put forth their best performance this season against Division I powerhouse UVM last Saturday. The Williams team was particularly inspired due to the devastating 41-0 loss suffered by the B-side during the previous week at the Mayor's Cup Tourney in Boston.

A side received the opening kickoff and proceeded to play excellent defense. However, UVM's attempts at scoring. Junior fullback Katy Carr played an excellent game as usual. Carr's long kicks and tough tackles stopped the UVM's speed and strength. Once out of dangerous territory, the Williams team gained more confidence and started to play a more offensive game. Margaret Wang '93 knocked the ball well to get it into the line.

tain for the game. The line sprinted forward and passed extremely well. A temporary defensive breakdown allowed the UVM line to run the ball 40 meters to score the lone try of the game. Williams, however, resumed the defensive mindset. Fierce tackles by Liz Martin '90 and Jackie Graves '90 put Williams in the game. Graves also blocked two kicks to keep the ball far from the defending try-zone.

Amanda Gallagher '90 consistently broke through the line outs to prevent UVM from getting the ball out to their line. A chance to tie up the game came in the second half when Laura Kalayjian 'EX ran the ball all the way up to the two meter mark. The UVM fullback stole the ball and kicked it out of her danger zone. In the last play of the game it seemed that UVM would widen the gap between the two teams with another try, but Kristin Moomaw '90 pushed the UVM wing out of bounds only six inches from the try-line. The whistle blew and the game ended in a 6-0 loss for Williams.

The B-side showed great desire as the team tried to avenge its loss from the previous week. Megan Hay '93 tackled incessantly. Andrea Walter '92 showed her experience through her smart decisions concerning the line. Sophomores Nickie Bouvier, Colleen "Lo-rax" Boland and Caitlin Mann all added a strong push for the Williams scrum. Well-placed kicks by fullback Mary Carney '93 kept the Williams team out of danger throughout the game. Janet "Grunt" Baker added a strong offensive component to the Williams team - her tremendous speed gained a lot of yardage. Commendable play from all fifteen players allowed Williams to hold the UVM A/B team to a 0-0 tie.

Degarmo takes Mt. Greylock

by Juan Alonzo

Williams cyclists for the last two weekends have left their tire marks on the New England cycling circuit. On Sunday Andrew Degarmo '92 won the annual climb up Mount Greylock, taking a minute off of his previous best time. It took Degarmo a scant 43:35 minutes to pound out 9.1 miles and climb 2700 feet. His reward? Glycogen depletion and a Giro helmet.

With a time of a little over 61 minutes, Mary Moulé '91 climbed into first place of the women's division.

Ian Penner '93 also climbed Greylock this past weekend and his time of 49:03 earned him a 7th place finish. Impressively, Penner started with a broken shifter and was forced to struggle up the incline on a 42-15 gear, a feat painful enough to make any cyclist flinch.

Other competitors at the Mount Greylock climb included Todd Lowe '92 at 57:29, Chris Sheridan '93 at 59:24, and Josh Brumberg '92 at 61:50. Lowe had only one comment at the finish: "Very painful."

Long Island, New York. This category 3 race covered 32k around a 1k, four-corner loop.

A huge field of 156 riders made crashes likely, but Seaman managed to avoid them and finished the race in 13th place. He pocketed $25 for a sprint lap and $35 for his 13th place finish.

On Sunday, October 8, the team left a strong impression at the Octoberfest Criterium sponsored by the Rutgers Cycling Club. The squad finished third overall, behind Columbia and Rutgers.

In the 30-mile Division C race, sophomores Larry Skowronek and Kent Wospeka placed 7th and 9th, respectively, in a field of 50 cyclists.

In the highly competitive 15-mile women's race, Moulé garnered third place despite blowing a tire midway through the event.

In the Division A race, Seaman again raced strongly. Midway through the race, Seaman was able to bridge himself to a breakaway of three riders, which included two cyclists from Rutgers and one from Wilkes College.

After the breakaway gained a minute on the field, Seaman was guaranteed at least a fourth place finish.

"In the last five laps, there were a lot of head games going on. It was difficult to tell who was really tired and who was only bluffing. In the final sprint, it turned out the two Rutgers riders weren't bluffing, they were really tired. It came down to a sprint between a cyclist from Wilkes College and me."

As it turned out, Seaman missed first place by half a blue length, but nonetheless contributed to the team's final third place standing.

Athlete of the Week

This week's recipients are Rob Lake '91 of the men's soccer team and Shelley Whelpton '90, captain of the women's volleyball team. Rob had his second career hat trick on Saturday against Bowdoin and now leads the team with 10 goals on the season. Shelley played a major role in the team's wins against Union, North Adams, Amherst and Wesleyan (16 kills, 6 aces) and in its overall 17-2 record so far. Congrats, Rob and Shelley!

Women's cross-country captures NESCAC title

by Heather Smith

The as-of-yet unbeatable Williams women's cross-country team ran another tremendous race Saturday when it successfully defended its 1988 New England Small College Association Championship (NESCAC) title at Amherst College. The men's team, suffering the loss of its three top scorers during the race, failed to accumulate a team score.

Facing their toughest competition of the season, the Williams women triumphed over a fast Bowdoin squad and nine other teams with 39 points. The Bowdoin team, ranked second in New England, followed with 47 points. The team with the lowest score wins.

Coach Larry Bell said, "We ran scared to death. All we knew was that [Bowdoin] was beating people badly [in Maine], but we didn't know how." Without having run against Bowdoin and without knowing information such as their runners' times, planning a strategic attack was virtually impossible. The women's team simply had to set their sights on Bowdoin runners, trust their strength, and react to the swings of the race.

Helene Wilburn '93 explained that in considering the competition during the race, "Every person we passed was one point and if they were wearing black and white shorts [from Bowdoin], they were two points."

The Ephs wisely hung back for the first mile of the race, but when they emerged from the woods near the two mile mark, Bowdoin continued to look strong and held four of the top eight places. However, junior Anne Platt had broken away from the lead pack during the second mile. Platt's move into the lead position seemed to be the instigating factor in the Eph's final success.

Wilburn explained, "I think [Bowdoin] wanted to shut us out. Just having one Williams person ahead of them helped to demoralize them." Before Platt broke away, Bowdoin's top four scorers were running together in a tight group. When Platt took the lead, Bowdoin's top two runners raced ahead in pursuit of her, which broke the Bowdoin pack into two couples. Molly Martin '92, Cherie Macaulay '92, and Wilburn '93 were close behind Platt and began to move closer to Bowdoin's third and fourth scorers. Nonetheless, at the 2.5 mile mark, Bowdoin still seemed to have the 3.1 mile race won. To anyone who proclaimed Bowdoin victors at that point, however, Williams gave an important cross-country lesson: never call a race before it's finished.

With Platt in the lead, the teams raced into the last and most hilly mile of the course. Martin and Macaulay pulled ahead of Bowdoin's second, third, and fourth scorers. Freshmen Wilburn and Lindley

by Augusto Torres

The Williams men's golf team overcame early adversity last week to finish third at Division III New England, held at New Seabury on October 7-8. Golf powerhouse Salent State finished first in the 20-team field. Little Three rival Amherst came in second, managing to play up to their full potential.

The New England tournament is the biggest and most competitive of the fall season, and the Ephs finished well despite early setbacks. In this tourney a different course is played each day; the course the Ephs took on the first day was right off the ocean. Because of the harsh winds blowing off the water, playing conditions were poor.

"This was the toughest course we played all year. All the holes were cut on slopes, so they had a lot of breaks in them," said co-captain Sean Seguin '91. The Ephs found themselves 10th in their division after the first day.

Determined not to give up, the team put in an early morning practice the next day to work on their swing. "Personally, that helped me a lot," Seguin said.

The practice seemed to have helped the rest of the team as well, as the Ephs' performance improved tremendously on the second day and scores went down dramatically. In addition, the course the team played was more inland than the first, which made conditions better. The Ephs finished third, the best performance by a Williams team at New England in several years.

Jeff Alexander '90 led the team with a low of 162. Ian Lapey '90 and Seguin tied for the second lowest score, each finishing with a 167.

This was the team's last tourney of the fall season. Seguin said of the season, "We're pretty satisfied. It's been the best season I've seen and probably the best season for the team in three or four years. We've shown a lot of potential."

The team has indeed fared well, consistently finishing among the top five in each of this season's tournaments. They say they are confident about their prospects for the spring season.

Field hockey wins Little Three Championship

by Birgit Huppuch

The women's field hockey team upped its record to an outstanding 7-0 last week with two close wins over Union, 2-1, and Amherst, 3-2. The Ephs are now ranked third in New England.

The big win of last week was Saturday's game against Amherst at Cole Field. After having shut out Wesleyan 6-0 earlier in the season, this come-from-behind victory captured the Little Three Championship for the Ephs. Alix Hyde '93, assisted by Amy Kershaw '90, scored the first goal of the game 9:40 into the first half. Amherst player Dubbs then scored two goals for the Jeffs, leaving the Ephs at the short end of a 2-1 score at the half. "This is the first time they've been down all season," Coach Chris Mason said at the time.

Her fears were soon allayed, however, as Williams came back to dominate the second half after the back-and-forth play of the first. "Second half we pulled it together and put the pressure on their goalkeeper," said co-captain Beth McNulty '90.

The Ephs kept the ball down by the Amherst goal and fought hard against Amherst's outstanding goalie, Danielle Waldrop, to score two more beautiful goals. Hyde rallied her second goal from an assist by McNulty 22 minutes into the half. Co-captain Maureen Flaherty '90 then scored the winning goal from a pass by Amy Kershaw '90 with six minutes left in the game. The Ephwomen outshot the Lady Jeffs 24-6 and had 15 penalty corners against Amherst's 2 corners.

Williams win against Union
The Ephs hosted Union last Thursday and seemed also to dominate the game. Fifty-eight seconds into the game Ann Marie Marvin '91 scored the first goal on a pass from Judy Fleishman '90. Union came back to score 18 minutes into the second half, but Williams continued to keep the pressure on its opponents.

With less than five minutes left in the game, a penalty stroke was created by Laurie Burnett '91 as she fought for the ball at the goal line. The ball was trapped between the Union goalie's feet, the penalty was called, and Amy Honigfeld '91 took the stroke to score the winning goal of the game.

"Union was aggressive and gave us a good game but we outshot them by quite a bit," commented Coach Mason. Williams outshot Union 18-6.

by Rhonda Goodman

The women's volleyball team overcame the blaring noise of the Amherst crowd to beat the Lady Jeffs, 15-12, 15-10 and the Wesleyan Cardinals, 15-4, 15-16, 15-8, thus taking the Little Three and pushing their overall record up to 17-2.

Coach Nancy Roberts said the Amherst match was tight in the first game until Madeline Eydt '91 served three consecutive aces to break the 10-10 tie. Eydt said she never realized her contribution was the deciding factor in the game.

"I don't look at the score when I play so I didn't even know the score was tied," she said.

Aces weren't the only offensive strategy used in the game. Holly Hedeman '92 had 5 kills. Kathy McConnell '91 had 4 kills and Shelly Whelpton '90 had 3 kills and 2 aces. Roberts said everything worked for the Ephs at a point when the game was on the line. "Our kills were on at the right time. We put [the balls] away when we needed to," she said.

Pouring on the power
The second match, against Wesleyan, was a tough one for the fifth-ranked (in didn't have enough time to warm up," she said. "We didn't play as well as we could've to pull out the [second] game."

Eydt said the second match was not particularly a reflection on the Williams team because both teams were playing at the same level after Wesleyan "got their act together."

'I don't look at the score when I play so I didn't even know the score was tied'

New England) Williams team. After dominating the eighth-ranked Cards in the first game, the Ephs faltered a little to lose the second game. Hedeman said the Ephs had an edge over their opponents because of the Cards' long trip.

"We knew we could take advantage of them because they had a long trip and

Roberts agreed that the Ephs took the Cardinals completely out of the game at first. She said that the second game was even -- that both teams played at the same level and Wesleyan did what it took to win the game. She also added that the consistency of setters Whelpton and Ruth Burday '90, a mixed offense and a mental will to win provided the Ephwomen enough potency to win the match.

"[Whelpton's and Burday's] consistency was key to setting up for kills," she said. "They really wanted to win Little Three."

Last Tuesday was an unlucky night for North Adams and Union. Both teams suffered defeats at the hands of the Williams team: Union (15-8, 15-10) and North Adams (15-4, 15-5). Roberts said it was hard for the squad to keep their concentration up because both matches were more defensive battles than offensive battles.

"Neither team had much of an offensive attack; there was a lot of passing back and forth," she said.

The Ephwomen said they hope to keep their intensity up for the Williams Invitational next week. The other teams participating are Trinity, Bard College, Wesleyan, Skidmore and Union.

Men's soccer routs Bowdoin Polar Bears, falls to U. of Mass Minutemen

by Jeff Merritt

Anybody out there need a few goals? The Williams men's soccer team has a few to spare from last Saturday's game at Cole Field, as the Ephs routed the Bowdoin Polar Bears 8-2, lifting their record to 7-2 on the season. Earlier in the week, though, the Ephs could have used a few of those goals themselves; they were shutout 1-0 by the Division I University of Massachusetts Minutemen.

After five consecutive games on the road, the Ephmen were thrilled to be returning to Cole Field for the match against Bowdoin.

"Playing on the road and riding those buses really takes a lot out of us," junior Rob Lake said. "We were all a little pumped to be back home."

The Bears actually jumped out to an early lead in the opening minutes of the game. A crossing pass from the right corner of the field went over the outstretched arm of goalkeeper Chuck Goldfarb '92, and a Bowdoin striker knocked the ball into the open net. The Williams offense took over after that, though, scoring more goals in one game than it had since an 11-0 drubbing of the University of Massachusetts way back in 1959.

Offensive barrage

Captain Dan Calichman '90 tied the game with 19:29 gone in the first half. The goal was set up when Ambi Stern '90 was tripped on the edge of the penalty area and Williams was awarded a direct kick. The captain's shot got through the wall of Bowdoin defenders and found the extreme lower corner of the net.

Lake scored the next two goals for the Ephs. On the first one, James Ryan '92 made a beautiful play to keep the ball in bounds along the sideline, and he then directed it to Doug Brooks '90. Brooks led a streaking Lake with a perfect pass, and Lake beat the Bowdoin goalkeeper to finish the play. On the next goal, the Bowdoin keeper failed to completely control a loose ball in his goalmouth, and Lake pounced on it to make the score 3-1 about 11 minutes before halftime.

The barrage continued in the second half, as the Ephmen wasted no time in sealing the victory. Less than four minutes into the half, Lake touched an indirect kick 12 yards from the net, leaving Calichman to swoop in and drive the ball off the wall of Bears in front of him. The shot ricocheted over to Sam McIlvain '90, who easily put the ball into the back of the net.

Ten minutes later the Ephs made the score 5-1, beginning a string of three goals in a span of two and a half minutes. Lake completed his hat trick with a header, beating the frustrated Bowdoin keeper to a beautiful long pass from Steve Bailey '91. It was Lake's team-leading tenth goal of the season and the second hat trick of his Williams soccer career.

Calichman then scored his second goal of the game with a header from the penalty area, while Bailey picked up another assist on the play. Laurin Laderoute '92, playing in only his second game of the season, made the score 7-1 after a pair of fine passes in the penalty area by Orjan Hult '92 and John Kennel '91.

The teams then traded goals to complete the scoring. The Polar Bears cut the deficit to five with a header past the underworked Goldfarb. This marked the first time this season that the Ephs had been scored upon twice in one game. With less than three minutes to play, freshman Shawn Allen scored his first goal ever at Williams on a play set up by freshman Greg Locraft. By this time, most of the Eph starters were resting on the bench, enjoying the rout right along with the Williams faithful cheering from the bleachers across the field.

The Ephs peppered the Bowdoin keeper with 24 shots in the game, while the Bears managed just seven of their own. Coach Michael Russo was obviously pleased with the offensive effort, as his team has had some trouble scoring goals this season.

"We've been working all season on getting more aggressive in the penalty area," he said. "I knew we had the capacity to explode like we did today. Everything just seemed to click."

Calichman had a simpler explanation for the blowout. "We couldn't wait to get back home," he said with a big smile.

Shutout by UMass

The grueling string of road games for Williams ended last Wednesday in a 1-0 loss to the University of Massachusetts. The contest was closely fought the whole way, with the lone goal coming after an indirect kick about 12 minutes into the second half.

Images lease signed; will reopen by 1990

by Mary Moule

Small-town moviehouses like Images Cinema are big in popular opinion these days—at least in the opinion of big stars like Williamstown's own Christopher Reeve. And so thanks partly to the Superman star, the future of Images Cinema on Spring Street is bright. The new owner and operator of Images, Donald Fisher, signed a lease with the owners of the building on October 16.

The Walden Block building, where Images is located, was bought last March by Elmac Realty, owned by William Thomas and John Elder.

According to Fisher, a five-year lease was signed with a five-year renewal option. He did not give details of the lease agreement. "It was a very hard-fought lease," he said.

The signing of the lease and the beginning of plans to renovate the entire building comes at the end of a long struggle to keep the movie theater open. Due to competition from larger multiple-screen operations, the future of the theater had been uncertain when the Elders bought the building seven months ago.

But thanks to a group of concerned citizens led by Williamstown resident and movie star Reeve, a fundraising campaign has made the continued operation of the theater possible.

The theater will return with several changes, however. The theater itself will be reduced to half of the original size, and the other half will be converted to commercial space, according to Fisher. Although the new theater will be smaller, several positive changes will take place.

The 198 remaining seats (out of the original 400) will be restored and the entire interior will be redecorated, Fisher said. New projection equipment is also planned. The original screen may or may not be replaced, depending on how much money is available, according to James

"The film format will be the same as it has been over the years," Fisher said. "That's the most important thing, so that's what we'll do." Images is known for showing many foreign and first-run films that larger, newer theaters often do not show. "We show a lot of films that we feel should be shown, but that don't always draw a big audience," he added. This commitment to show these kinds of films as well as the big hits may be part of Reeve's interest in saving the theater.

Alcohol panel delves into booze issues

by Evan Preisser

Baria, booze, and boot charts were featured in the recent panel talk, "Why Wasted at Williams?" The twelve-student panel, which was moderated by a College Council member, met on Sunday, October 15, as the first event in the "Alcohol Awareness Week" at Williams.

Alcohol and athletics were discussed early in the session. "Parties are important for teams to spend time with each other after practices or games. They create cohesiveness," Amy Kershaw '90, a member of the varsity field hockey team, said.

Molly O'Meara '92 added, "The frequency of parties depends a lot on what team you're talking about. Parties happen after practice, except for maybe the rugby."

Competitiveness was cited as another important part of drinking at Williams. Audience members recalled "boot charts" in their freshman entries that competitively kept track of how many times each entry member had thrown up.

Male Bonding

"In an all-male entry, male bonding played a large role in drinking. The competition to see who could drink the most was intense," Ted Moore '92 said. Several members of the audience echoed similar sentiments; one of them said that Williams students seem to carry classroom intensity into parties and drinking.

Several freshmen had another view of drinking at Williams. Mary Buss '93 said, "People in freshman entries who have booted don't seem to be that proud of it."

Upperclassmen attribute this to changing rules; one audience member said "The whole scheme and emphasis of freshman drinking has changed as a result of the new alcohol policy [which prohibits freshman keg parties]."

A lack of alternative campus activities on weekend nights was another reason cited for drinking. Andy Komarff '90 said, "The school should establish another Log. There are now only the two extremes of drinking and non-drinking activities on campus. We need a club that serves drinks."

The panel also covered experimentation with alcohol, especially during the freshman year. Keith Hedlund '93, a member of the panel, said "Many freshmen come to Williams with the perspective of wanting to fit in. They see others drinking and end up drinking themselves."

Several upperclassmen recalled that they drank much more than normal during their freshman year. One student even said that she had become alcoholic and went to meals and classes drunk.

Personal choice issue

Drinking as an issue of personal choice was yet another controversial issue raised. Hedlund said, "A college policy or recommendation on whether to drink or not to drink contradicts personal choice—this is not a moral issue, it's a personal one." Kershaw added, "There is such a thing as a 'responsible drinker.' Drinking can be a very positive social experience for many people."

While many agreed with Hedlund, O'Meara attacked the common result of drunkenness. She said, "A lot of people feel that once you're drunk, you're not responsible. That's wrong—you are always responsible for your behavior."

Both panelists and audience members expressed concern over peer pressure to drink and not to drink. One student in the audience said, "Lots of drinkers give non-drinkers the friendly shit about not drinking; there is pressure to join in." Others described experiences when they had been hassled by non-drinkers about how much or when they had been drinking.

The panel wound up by briefly discussing the need for alcohol and parties. One student summed it fairly concisely. He said, "We need something stupid and superficial like drinking to wind down after the week. If we didn't have drinking on campus, we'd need to put down something equally stupid and superficial in its place."

Ca. students call home by radio

by Damon Hemmerdinger

The Dean's Office and local ham radio operator Richard Goodman offered their services to the college community in the wake of last Tuesday's major earthquake in the San Francisco Bay area.

Dean of the College Stephen Fix wrote a letter to students inviting them to ask the deans for help in reaching family members.

The Dean's Office remained open late on Wednesday, the day after the disaster struck. A dean was available all day to assist students. The office offered use of its long-distance phone lines.

"There have been times when we've had to get information to students quickly," Fix said. "But in terms of offering the facilities of the Dean's Office as a means of communication, this is the first time in recent years we've done this."

Most importantly, according to Fix, the Dean's Office communicated information about the disaster to students. Many of the students who had spoken to family members told the deans about damage to various cities, college campuses and specific buildings. The deans monitored news broadcasts and checked with a telephone information service.

"Most people who came in had no news," Fix said. Goodman, who owns Goodman's Jewelers on Spring Street, is an active ham radio operator and serves as Emergency Coordinator for Western Massachusetts. He has been offering his help to the college for ten years.

His services were in demand right after the earthquake struck. "Within an hour of the quake, I got calls," he said. "Most of the phones within the city worked. AT&T closed the 415 and 408 area codes from incoming calls because there was gridlock."

Former Williams prof. Carlos Egan missing, presumed dead in Honduras plane crash

Former Assistant Professor of Political Science Carlos Egan is believed to be among 131 people killed in the crash of passenger jet in Honduras Saturday.

According to Professor of Political Science Kurt Tauber, who has been in touch with members of Egan's family, "There is no positive confirmation [that Egan was killed]. But there is negative confirmation -- he is not among the survivors."

Tauber, who was a friend of Egan's, added, "The bodies [of the victims] are so unrecognizable that only 30 have been identified." He said that Professor of Romance Languages Antonio Gimenez collected Egan's dental records and sent them down to Tegucigalpa, Honduras several days ago to help identify him.

As the Record went to press Monday evening, the Dean's Office and the News

Office were both unable to confirm that Egan had been killed. However, Tauber said, "He was definitely on the plane. That is for certain."

Egan, 39, was on a semester break from Carleton College in Northfield, Minnesota. He left Williams at the end of last semester after teaching in the political science department here for seven years. At Williams he specialized in Latin American affairs, and took special interest in human rights in the region. Last Winter Study Egan took 12 students to Nicaragua as part of a special course.

He graduated from the University of Delaware in 1971 and received his doctorate in political science from the University of California at Berkeley in 1977. After teaching at Berkeley from 1977 to 1977, he went to Occidental College in Los Angeles and taught there before coming to Williams in 1982.

Egan was a senior fellow at the International Center for Development Policy in Washington, D.C. He also appeared as a guest columnist for USA Today, writing several pieces about former President Ronald Reagan's Central American policy.

Tauber said that Egan was visiting friends in Nicaragua, where the Honduran-run Boeing 727 took off. Fifteen American were among the 146 people on board, and three of the 15 survivors are American, a TAN-SAHSA airline spokesperson told the Associated Press.

Officials of the United States National Transportation Safety Board arrived at the crash site yesterday to retrieve the flight data recorder, or "black box," which may give some clues as to why the plane crashed.

A group of 15 of these students met with Pittsfield minority high school students last month to advocate higher education and serve as role models for younger blacks in a predominantly white community.

Abbygail Dobson '92, coordinator of the mentoring program this year, said this introductory counseling session was the first of monthly meetings with the 15 participating students from several different high schools who compose the tiny minority of blacks in the Pittsfield school system. At these sessions, WBSU members provide information about the college community of Williams as experienced by black students as well as some tutoring.

Visits to Williams Dobson said that this year the program will be expanded to include monthly

Positive role models

WBSU members help county youth

"Help save our Black communities—help secure your own future," urges Marcia Ruth Davis in the magazine article from The Black Collegian featured this week in the Williams Black Student Union glass display in Baxter Hall. Hopkins Hall: classrooms with a view

by Keith Hedlund

If you fall asleep during a lecture in one of the new Hopkins Hall classrooms, hope that you stir a little: those rooms have been equipped with motion-sensitive lights that turn off after several minutes of detecting no movement in the room. This is just one of the many innovations which have greeted the first students to take classes in these rooms, which were completed at the end of last year.

There are two classrooms in the basement, the "1964 Classroom" and the "East Socratic Classroom." These rooms hold up to forty students each, and even though chairs in these rooms are attached to the floor, students can slide the seats forward, bend them backwards and spin them around 360 degrees.

Students sitting in the basement rooms can also see others pass by outside the building, though many a class has been watched by students peering in through the ceiling-level windows.

Ephs sitting in the five other classroom dispersed throughout the remaining four floors of Hopkins don't have the advantage of the high-tech chairs or the vending machines, but their rooms are carpeted like the basement rooms and also offer a good view of the campus.

Let confusion reign
The hallways outside classrooms on all the floors boast "mock" doors adorned with mirrored panels which have mystified students and faculty alike. Bill Movitt '93 said, "I was really confused the first day of classes. There seemed to be millions of classrooms, and none of them were mine."

This summer the building also confused members of the national Organic Farmer Association, who were having a convention at Williams. Because the rooms didn't have labels on them yet, the members were seen running up and down the building looking for their meetings.

But aside from these confusions, students seem generally satisfied with the new rooms. Andrew Malm '90 said, "Before this semester I've always had a class in the basement of Bronfman. [Hopkins] is so beautiful and clean that I really enjoy being a student at Williams."

Though most students have lauded the aesthetic values of the new rooms, however, there is some question as to whether the college has made the rooms so nice that they get in the way of education. Mowitt said, "I spend a lot of my time pondering the cylindrical objects suspended from the ceiling which lights

Rebecca Borden '91, who has a class in the room on the fourth floor, which offers a beautiful view of the Berkshire Mountains, said, "Sometimes during lectures I watch people climb up Pine Cobble."

Kevin Cook '90 said, "The view is pretty good, but I try not to stare out the window in a class costing a couple thousand dollars. I didn't come to Williams mysteriously emanates from. And the best thing about my classroom is that the tables are exactly the right distance from the wall for me to lean my chair back against the wall and still be able to reach the table."

Dylan Twomey '90 had a similar thought about the East Socratic Classroom. He said, "It's not really Socratic at all. It's a lecture room. Socrates taught at dinner parties."

for the view." He added that the building of the new classrooms seems to contradict the college's concern about classes becoming too large and less focused on discussion, especially in lieu of their naming of one of the rooms after Socrates, who taught his students through personal dialogue. "The [classrooms'] structure directs the discussion at the teacher," he said. The college should be trying to facilitate discussion instead of just "throwing a whole new building" at the issue.

Another reason for alarm, Young said,

Teenagers becoming AIDS risk group

College Press Service

Alarming new data show the AIDS epidemic may be spreading rapidly among teenagers.

The Federal Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta says it has now documented 415 cases of Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome among teens between the ages of 13 and 19.

"AIDS is a public health crisis in all age groups, but we are concerned about teenagers," Charles Fallis of the CDC said.

Scientists long have worried that teens and college-aged people, who as singles tend to have more than one sex partner, were the next at-risk group to contract the fatal disease, which destroys the body's immune system, allowing normally suppressed diseases to occur.

A study of student blood samples at 20 campuses last February and March revealed about two out of every 1,000 collegians -- by extrapolation, four Williams students -- were infected with the AIDS virus.

The latest CDC numbers suggest the virus has spread further since then. In all, the CDC estimates that 1 million to 1.5 million of the nation's 230 million people are infected with the AIDS virus, at a rate of 4.3 to 6.5 per 1,000 people. The rate for teens may be even higher, the new figures indicate.

Using a slightly different age definition, Dr. Mary Young, an infectious disease specialist at Georgetown University Hospital, said 900 13-to-21-year-olds had been diagnosed as having AIDS as of January, 1989.

"Assume it will get higher" "The problem is that those figures are just the actual AIDS cases. For every person who has AIDS, there are five or six HIV-positives (people who have the virus, but have not begun to suffer disease-related symptoms yet) running around. So you have to assume that the number will get much higher," Young said.

As they "run around," of course, they may unwittingly spread the disease to their sex partners. Another reason for alarm, Young said, is that it takes seven to nine years for AIDS symptoms to show up. That means people are contracting the disease at ages as young as 10 years old.

Young said that young black and Hispanic women living in urban areas are in the highest risk group, especially if they are drug users or have intercourse with drug users. And, she said, the problem is still especially prevalent in specific areas, such as New York City, Miami, Washington D.C., Los Angeles and San Francisco.

"The risk is less for a sexually active young woman in the middle of the country, but that doesn't mean she shouldn't be careful," Young said. "It's prudent for all sexually active women to take precautions."

Condoms not being used
However, precautions like condoms, generally considered the easiest protectors against sexually transmitted diseases to use, have proven unpopular to use. A recent Urban Institute in Washington, D.C., study found that only 30 percent of the adolescent males surveyed use condoms every time they have intercourse.

Twenty-eight states and the District of Columbia require their schools to have AIDS education programs, although all states get federal money to stage them, adds Marie Schumacher of the National Association of State Boards of Education.

Schumacher noted lesson plans in only three states -- North Carolina, Oklahoma and Washington -- mention condoms as means of preventing the spread of AIDS.

On the other side of the spectrum of official response to the disease, British Columbia installed condom machines in its high schools' restrooms in mid-September. Toronto schools will install them during Christmas break. The Toronto decision came after Perry Kendall, Toronto's medical health officer, reported 47 known positive AIDS tests among local teens between the ages of 15 and 19. He estimated that there may be as many as nine additional positive tests for each reported case.

Through the ham radio system, Goodman contacted other "hams" in San Francisco and Oakland. From information received from volunteers who monitored the situation, the hams relayed updates to Goodman and other ham radio operators throughout the country.

"The first night, it took a few hours to get an answer," Goodman said. "By [Thursday] morning, I got answers within ten minutes. Our role is essentially over at this point."

Most phone service has been restored to the Bay area, and long-distance phone companies reported that, despite a heavy volume, almost all calls into the region were getting through by Saturday.

Goodman became interested in ham radio in 1951, and got involved in "third party messages" ten years ago. He has helped transmit messages during such disasters as Hurricane Hugo and the 1985 earthquake in Mexico City.

"It's strictly a hobby, but you can get wrapped up in it because it's public service. It's nice when you can go out and do something and be appreciated for it," he said. "Students are always welcome to use [my services]."

Williams looks to market itself

by Linda Good

For the second consecutive year, Williams College placed third in U.S. News and World Report's ranking of America's best national liberal arts colleges. With that information starting them in the proverbial face, the Admissions Office has grappled once again with that burning question: to market Williams or not to market Williams?

The word "marketing" carries with it some what of a stigma in the eyes of some of the faculty at Williams, who believe that the intellectual atmosphere of the college itself should be the only tool to draw the most qualified students. However, Director of Admissions Thomas Parker told professors assembled at last Wednesday's faculty meeting that there needed to be more initiative on the part of the college.

He said, "I don't think there can be two more opposite ways of looking at the world than those of the faculty and those of the marketing world. To market or not to market is a moot question. We have always marketed ourselves."

Parker noted a distinct difference in the quality of students who expressed interest in the college of their own accord, and those who were the targets of aggressive marketing on the part of the Admissions Office.

"On one end of the spectrum is the student who exercises the most initiative. He sets up an interview in Williamstown, drives down, takes the guided tour. This student is more likely to be white, wealthy, from the Northeast, and, unfortunately, less qualified."

"On the other end is the student we contact through direct mail, who is less likely to seek this place out. He is more likely to be brighter, from a minority group, and less likely to be from the Northeast."

Parker expressed concern at the son of reputation Williams college acquires when marketing is left to the popular press. In 1987, for example, when the college was ranked number one in U.S. News and World Report, there was an accompanying article about the colleges listed. The article characterized Carleton as egalitarian, Swarthmore as intellectual, and Williams as "preppy."

Parker said that the focus of their marketing strategy would be to change the literature. "We've been in the process of completely revising it. To do a good job, we're throwing everything out the window and starting all over again. We've already had positive first return results from our direct student search. Our returns are up at least 25 percent," he said. "We've also started a program of early prewriting to those students we feel are the 'cream of the crop,' and who could probably get in anywhere."

Parker explained exactly what sort of image he wanted to portray of the col-

Psych services expects more visits

by Navin Girishankar

After a disappointing year, psychological services is expecting the number of students using the counseling services for evaluations to increase, according to Dr. John Howland, director of psychological services at the Thompson Health Center.

Howland said, "Last year we had about 158 students who saw people for evaluation and of the students who went back, there was an average of about six or seven visits. The number was low. We're not exactly sure why that is."

Howland, the only full-time psychiatrist at the service, said of the normal figure in previous years, "It is more on the order of 100 to 120 percent which would translate to 200 to 240 students." He said that he expects the number to rise again this year from last year's low. "This year is going to be a bumper year."

Seniors at Williams use the psychological services most, while freshmen use it the least. However Howland asserted that this in no way means that seniors need it more.

"I think it has to do with how people see themselves in the world. I think the seniors are a little more comfortable with the idea that this is a service that's here for them," he said. "A person who is less mature might see it as somehow a greater stigma. Perhaps it takes a while to grow past this step. As a freshman, you might be more inclined to use this service as some kind of admission of a problem rather than as a place to solve a problem."

But one problem that seems to cut across class lines is depression, perhaps the most prevalent psychological disorder that is seen down at psych services. "I guess if we were to look at any category, probably people come in with depression more than they come in with other feelings," Howland said. Depression is a problem that represents approximately 15 to 20 percent of the cases at the psychological services.

"Depression comes in several varieties," Howland said. "Depression is sometimes a symptom, sometimes a feeling that comes because you don't feel very good about yourself, or how things are."

The various causes of these types of depressions are relatively visible on a college campus, Howland said. "It comes because of a lot of reasons -- reasons of not adjusting very well, not meeting your own expectations for work, being disappointed in your relationships, feeling down for a while because you're not making the team. You see people with those kinds of things that are related to their own image of themselves. Sometimes it's for a short time, sometimes it's been going on for a long time."

At Williams, there are also cases of depression in the form of a medical illness that can be inherited. There are numerous symptoms for this type of depression.

"Depression also comes as an illness for which there are a lot of symptoms. [Patients] have a hard time concentrating on work, a hard time sleeping, a hard time dealing with anxiety and that often lasts for months and months; sometimes medication is important."

An example of medical depression is a bipolar depression which is characterized by mood swings making it difficult to concentrate on academics and other activities. Howland said that the more prevalent type of depression is a "long-standing low grade depression."

The potential psychological effects of the college experience at Williams and other institutions on a student vary in individual cases.

"When you're in college, you're going through a time of change, when you're going through a whole lot of development, a whole lot of things are becoming different, and it requires a lot of adaptation and some people are well equipped to handle that change, other people are poorly equipped, and most people are somewhere in between. In addition some people have severely dysfunctional backgrounds or problems that have not been adequately resolved before they get here."

Other disorders

One concern dealt with by psychological services is eating disorders. "A lot of people have eating concerns; they know that they're eating is disorderly. They find themselves compulsively eating and compulsively avoiding food," Howland said. "Most people don't meet the hard criterion for an eating disorder in psychiatric terms. But they have worries and concerns and they have mainly eating habits that cause them to stress."

Howland said that problems in adjusting to college arose in a noticeable number of students who are able to deal with college life but lack the confidence to do so. "Yes, a lot of people are short on self-confidence. People who are well-equipped but lack the confidence, might need psychological services so that we can tell them, 'You're well-equipped, go ahead, get on with it.'"

Despite high alcohol consumption on campus, the number of drug and alcohol-related cases is small.

"People with alcohol related issues tend to deny that it's a problem and don't see it as a psychological problem. They might begin to see their trouble as alcohol related. But certainly a lot more kids are out there with alcohol related problems but don't choose to see that way."

The DePaul University Professional Master of Science in Accountancy Program

1990 LA&S GRADUATES: A Special Announcement concerning Careers in Business Specifically for Liberal Arts and Sciences Students.

The School of Accountancy of DePaul University, Chicago, Illinois, a 75-year leader in innovative accounting education, offers to selected graduates of prestigious Liberal Arts and Sciences programs the Professional Master of Science in Accountancy. The program is offered in conjunction with the nation's leading accounting firms, is highly competitive, and restricted to students sponsored by the participating accounting firms.

The 15-month program entails:

- immediate (June 1990) employment in the Chicago office of a sponsoring accounting firm.
 - an accelerated course of study in business and accounting -- a growth industry -- at Chicago's DePaul University.
- Successful completion of the DePaul Professional MSA program results in:
- A Master of Science in Accountancy degree from DePaul University
 - Full-time business and accounting experience with a major accounting firm
 - Eligibility to sit for the CPA Examination in Illinois
 - Broad career opportunities, and advancement, in professional accounting with your sponsoring firm.

Participation is restricted to candidates sponsored by participating accounting firms.

The Professional MSA Program begins mid-June, 1990.

For more information on the Professional MSA Program, contact the placement office on this campus, which is cooperating with this program, or Dr. John T. Ahern, Jr., Director, School of Accountancy, DePaul University, 25 E. Jackson, Chicago, Illinois 60604, (312) 341-8770.

The New World String Orchestra, with members Ross Harbaugh, Vahn Armstrong, Benjamin Simon, and Curtis Macomber, performed in Brooks-Rogers on Saturday. (Thomas)

by Beth Neely

The New World String Quartet did not deal only with Beethoven, Ligeti, and Schubert during Saturday evening's performance in Brooks Rogers. This Harvard Quartet-in-Residence also met with such unexpected events as an overflowing auditorium and a popped string which temporarily stopped the Schubert.

As thirty students sat around them on the stage, due to the flooded aisles, the quartet created the intimate setting of the chamber music of the old days, eliciting a standing ovation from the crowd.

The quartet consisted of first violinist Curtis Macomber, second violinist Vahn Armstrong, violist Benjamin Simon (who masqueraded under the mistaken label of "pianist" on the program), and cellist Ross Harbaugh.

It was the newer work, Ligeti's rarely performed String Quartet No. 1, "Metamorphoses Nocturnes," (1954) in which the quartet's offering was most vibrant and refined. The group was like a biological organism itself, as the four players breathed and anticipated new changes of musical character as one being Ligeti, a Hungarian, wrote the work directly after Stalin's death in 1953, and his free tonal language reflects a new musical liberation.

The quartet made the most of this freedom as they both weaved and jumped in and out of the nocturnes, which were anything but dreamy nighttime serenades. Their sense of humor caught a human quality in the banterings and quibbles between instruments, eliciting several unexpressed chuckles in the audience. These interchanges recalled the humor of Bela Bartok, the "Happy Hungarian" composer.

The work was a study of sounds: a drone of mosquitoes in the upper strings, snaps on the fingerboard of the cello, the glassy texture of muted glissandos in all instruments at the end.

Several members of the audience took a look at the scores at intermission, no doubt to see how a composer notates such things. The players dove into these sounds with a directness and astuteness, and the strong individual playing combined to create a sense of group ownership of the piece; this was no trial run.

The Beethoven Quartet in D Major, Opus 18 No. 3, however, seemed to be more of a casual read-through and was not a strong offering. Even an early quartet such as this one celebrates the equality of part writing which Beethoven championed, but the New World did not pick up on this at all in the sections which called for it.

Especially in the first movement, the first violin engulfed the other instruments, resulting in a lack of rich cushioning for the melodic line and a lack of assertion when other instruments took over. In the slow movement no care was taken in passing a melodic line from instrument to instrument.

In the Presto Finale, the group proved that they could play quickly and loudly, but this made the movement sound like a wind-up toy, with too much energy to pause in the breathing spaces of the rests. This selection was different than the late Beethoven quartet advertised, and the quality of the playing here, compared to the Ligeti, might be attributed to a programming difficulty.

The program concluded with an expressive performance of Schubert's Quartet in D Minor, "Death and the Maiden." After its first performance in Schubert's time, the first violinist is recorded as saying, "Brother, this won't do, let well alone -- stick to your licker!"

At that Schubert gathered the music and shut it away in his desk, never to be played again in his lifetime. Today, however, it is one of the best loved chamber works. Its name stems from the second movement, an Andante theme and variations based on Schubert's song of the same title.

The sound of the quartet in the work was a marked transformation from the Beethoven, as each instrument was king and increased the richness of the texture. A popped string in the first violin stopped the action, but treated the audience to another hearing of the turbulent intensities of the opening.

More might have been made of the dynamic contrasts in the third and fourth movements, to create a sense of suspense and restraint amid the ebullience. The fineness of the ending created an immediate rushing excitement, but the beauty of the full, comforting tones in the second movement was material to savor in retrospect.

New conductor leaves his mark on the Berkshire Symphony

by Beth Neely

Ronald Feldman, the new director of the Berkshire Symphony, emerged from what he called "an amazing first rehearsal" to grab some sustenance at the snack bar. Amid the 10 p.m. study break dim, he described the simple chemistry that can happen between conductors and players in general.

"There's something about what [the conductors] say, the way they act, that gives [the players] a good feeling and makes them want to work hard." According to some Williams musicians, the sort of relationship has already sprung up between the Boston musician and his new orchestra.

The group is preparing for their first concert of the season this Saturday night at 8:00 p.m. in Chapin Hall. The works, which Feldman carefully selected, will be Boston composer John Harbison's "Remembering Gatsby" (inspired by the Gatsby of Scott Fitzgerald), Elgar's Cello Concerto, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7.

At 41, Feldman defies all the stereotypes of conductors as tyrants on pedestals, removed from the players. In this year's audition process, he not only listened to everyone, he also met with them.

"It was really a wonderful experience, because [I wasn't] listening to judge people. I just wanted to meet everybody, and I wanted everybody to feel that I cared who they were and knew their names, rather than to step up there and never get to talk to everyone...I think that everyone feels much closer having gone through that process," Feldman said.

Perhaps Feldman's rapport with the players stems from his own musical roots as a cellist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a position he still maintains after twenty-two years. While a freshman at Boston University School of the Arts, Feldman decided to audition for a RSO cello opening just to see what it would be like when he got out of college.

"I remember getting to the finals, which was the first surprise, and I did not have any Bach prepared, and [Leinsdorf, the BSO director] always wanted to hear Bach. I had the Dvorak Concerto and a Beethoven Sonata. I sat down, and he yelled, 'BACH!' It pushed me back in my chair, and I said in a meek voice, 'I don't have any Bach, but I have BACH-stein.' I didn't even know what I had said. I just used his pronunciation."

Apparently this amused Leinsdorf, and Feldman was accepted to the orchestra. His experience as a cellist was a springboard for conducting, Feldman said he observed the actions of various conductors and made note of what needed to be said that never was. His first conducting experience was his audition with the Mystic Valley Orchestra (now the New England Philharmonic).

"I was so uncomfortable. I remember after half an hour I was totally drenched in front of the orchestra. It was such a strange experience being on the podium. Conducting was totally foreign to me; I had no idea what it was going to be like up there," he said.

Since this first effort, Feldman has gained experience as conductor of the New England Philharmonic, the Worcester Symphony Orchestra, and the Boston new music ensemble Extension Works.

Along with his new position as director of the Berkshire Symphony, Feldman is the conductor of the Boston Conservatory Orchestra and assistant conductor of The Boston Pops. This sounds like an impossible juggling act, but conveniently,

Ronald Feldman

Feldman said, he and his family have built a home in this area which they spend time in anyway.

What led Feldman to apply for a job in the Berkshires, away from his activities in Boston? When he heard about the director opening here, Feldman was interested, but not thrilled. "I thought about it, but I didn't know how the orchestra played, and I didn't know how serious the college was about the orchestra."

Feldman said his guest conducting experience with the Berkshire Symphony last spring led to his current three-year contract. "Working with the orchestra was a pleasure. There are a lot of professional musicians in this area, which really surprised me. There are just some really wonderful players...I got the feeling when I was conducting that people were interested. People cared to play well, and cared about what I had to say."

Feldman said he plans to have five rehearsals within the three weeks before each concert, a change from the first weekly rehearsals of other years. "My experience with this type of orchestra -- a mixture of regional and student [players] -- is that the longer you leave the rehearsals from one rehearsal to the next, the more time you spend getting back to where you were...There's [at least] a day between each rehearsal so that there's time to digest, but not to forget."

This season features an American contemporary work on each program. Feldman said, "I think that [promoting American composers] is important. I always feel as if they aren't treated as seriously as European composers. I think a lot of conductors of major orchestras -- mostly European conductors -- don't treat American music and American composers seriously. That's something I'm going to do." He stressed the fragility of programming new music.

"There are so many things to consider: whether the orchestra can play it and do it justice, whether the audience in the particular town you are conducting in wants to hear it, and whether they put up with it on a steady basis."

For the first concert, Feldman has chosen "Remembering Gatsby," a contemporary work by American Pulitzer Prize-winning composer John Harbison. Feldman conducted the premiere of the work with the Boston Pops last season. He described it as "a cute piece...It sort of has a pit band sound with a saxophone playing away in the background. It's very jazzy, and a bit like the bar scene in the Star Wars movie. But there's also a dark motive that keeps creeping in that is very sinister."

The Elgar Cello Concerto and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will complete the program. The cellist will be the Naumburg Award-winning Andres Diaz, whom Feldman also championed back in Boston. Feldman promised that the Beethoven, which he first thought of as a gamble, will be a success.

"If the first rehearsal is any indication, they're going to be able to play that Beethoven Seventh technically very well." In addition, he noted that very little Beethoven had been played by the orchestra in the past several years.

Feldman said he hopes to introduce a new feature: invited symphonic commissioned works for general occasions and for the celebration of the two hundredth birthday of Williams in 1993, an idea about which the music department is excited. In addition, master classes in cello and strings are under discussion.

As for his own musical career, Feldman said he would like to continue and expand his conducting, but is also content with what he is doing now. "I am very happy with my professional life and with living in Berkshire. I don't have this searing ambition to be the best conductor that ever was and just gobble up all these conductors who are in my way, just to try to push myself to the top. I feel that as I move from one thing to the next, if that's what happens, it will happen comfortably and when the time is right."

MoCA can work, but needs money now

by Jerry Useem

The Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art cleared a major hurdle when the MassMoCA Cultural Development Commission approved a draft of its feasibility study at an October 2 meeting.

The 272-page report, which summarizes the findings of a state-funded study conducted over the past year, determined that MoCA is financially workable, but that much has to be done before the concept can become a reality.

The state legislature set aside $35 million for the MoCA project in the spring of 1988, but the money will not be released until a final draft of the feasibility study is submitted to the state after being reviewed by the Cultural Development Committee Dec. 11. About $1.7 million of the $35 million has been used already to fund the study and architectural planning.

The study set the museum's estimated annual cost of operation at $4.8 million, up from the $2.2 million estimated in the original proposal. The projected cost of construction also increased by almost $5 million to a total of $77.5 million.

According to Joseph Thompson, director of the MassMoCA executive planning group, the increased cost projections will be compensated for by increased fundraising. Besides the $35 million from the state, MoCA will seek $17 million from private developers and businesses and $45 million in private donations. Earlier proposals did not include plans for any sort of private endowment.

A "Founding Friends" program has already been set up in which local residents can pledge small amounts of money in support of the museum.

"The decision to seek an endowment is an important addition to the financial structure of the museum," Thompson said. "We feel that it's crucial in securing the financial underpinning of the project over the next five to seven years."

In regard to the increased cost estimates, Thompson said "there was no single dramatic issue, but many incremental issues that contributed to the increase, some of which relate to the physical operation of the plant, such as heating and maintenance, and some of which relate to a higher commitment to education and community outreach programming."

The MoCA complex, which will include restaurants, an inn and retail stores selling art-related products, will host an estimated 150,000 visitors a year. The projected opening date is 1994.

Seven-year plan

The feasibility study lays out a two-phase plan for the construction of the museum over seven years. In the first phase, 200,000 square feet of museum space will be completed at a cost of $40 million. In the second phase, the size of the museum will be doubled after enough money has been raised from private sources and the operation of the museum itself.

Thompson said he feels confident that the findings of the study are fairly accurate but still allow for some flexibility.

"We're trying to predict an uncertain world," he said. "We made a series of assumptions, most of which are quite conservative. Given the fact that this is a large and complex project, we've tried to bolster the situation by bringing in the best commercial and economic forecasters that are available."

Another obstacle that the planning group faces is acquiring the 28-building complex from Sprague Technologies Inc., the electric company that occupied the buildings for 45 years before moving out in 1985. Sprague and MoCA are negotiating right now but Thompson refused to say anything about the talks except that he was "optimistic that we'll work out a mutually agreeable time-frame" for transferring the buildings from Sprague to MoCA ownership; negotiations are reportedly close to completion.

Thompson said the planning group is also pursuing the possibility of becoming the sister museum of the Guggenheim in New York City. The museums would share artwork and personnel through a formal link.

"The benefits of this tie would be many for MassMoCA, ranging from the name recognition to the shared marketing that an institutional link can give rise to," Thompson said. "It opens up a vast cultural market. To be able to draw on the Guggenheim's expertise presents a tremendous advantage to MassMoCA. It can also provide access to art and the inner workings of the art world."

According to Betty Dunkum '90, who has been working as an intern for MassMoCA since last September, the museum is also seeking to form a link with Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute. RPI would supply the latest technology that could add a new dimension to the museum. For example, pieces of artwork such as sculptures could be fed into a computer so that one could view and rotate the sculpture on the computer screen.

One question that is still being asked is whether or not MassMoCA is the solution for North Adams' and the Northern Berkshire's economic troubles. Could the state money be better spent?

According to Thompson, "MassMoCA is not a cure-all for the economic ills of Northern Berkshire county and it's never pretended to be. It's a catalyst. It's a long-term investment, and its effects will be incremental."

"I believe that this is a healthier, more prudent use of public money than pumping large amounts of cash into projects that may have dramatic effects in the short-term, but don't look at the long-term economic picture for Northern Berkshire County."

State Rep. Sherwood Guernsey, D-Williamstown, who has been a strong supporter of MoCA from the very beginning, said community support is as strong as ever despite the doubling of the estimated cost.

Community support was demonstrated on the night of Oct. 2 at a reception for Mario Merz, an Italian artist who constructed three contemporary sculptures in building 11. Williamstown residents, former Sprague employees and members of the New York art world all rubbed shoulders for one evening in a display of enthusiasm for the museum.

"We've had no erosion of support inside the county. I'm confident that the museum can raise enough money privately to meet the increased cost; as long as there is an organized effort to raise money, I believe the money can be secured."

In response to critics who argue that the state should not be spending millions on a museum while vital state programs are being cut in the budget squeeze, Guernsey cites the fact that the $35 million bond approved by the state legislature is outside the normal budget. That is, the bond cannot be used to fund other programs—it must be used to help North Adams. And Guernsey believes MassMoCA is the best way to help North Adams.

"Short-term critics ignore the fact that MoCA will eventually create revenue for the state to replenish the coffers," Guernsey said. "It will attract businesses and encourage job development and growth, and this is crucial to the future of the area. We'll see a wide spectrum of jobs created from the spinoff. If someone has a better way to create more jobs in the area, then let them come forth."

"We've been trying for years to get companies to come in to North Adams, but it's hard going," he said. "Where is the basis for creating more jobs when Massachusetts has lost 50,000 industry jobs in the last two or three years alone? I feel MassMoCA is a very critical part of our efforts and I'm going to fight for it as long as I'm able to."

Guernsey said that although the approval of the feasibility study is a major victory, the hardest part is ahead. He compared the situation to that of a politician: although the campaign is difficult, it's even harder once you start the job.

"Implementing the study is a Herculean task and we need all the commitment and support we can possibly garner. We can't make the dream come true unless we roll up our sleeves and work at it. I think we have been very fortunate to have the partnership of the North Adams community and Williams College."

Marketing Williams: an issue of numbers

lege. "A little while ago I saw one of our retired professors on the cover of Newsweek [in the article] he characterized Williams as a 'bastion of old Protestant money,'" he said.

"We are determined to make ourselves more unique, less pompous, less arrogant, and more direct. We want to portray ourselves as an intellectual community in context with the history of the place without actually calling ourselves that." The projected cost of the revamping of the literature is about $900,000 over five years. Parker, however, believed that was worth it. "Ten years ago we marketed rather badly. Without more aggressive marketing on the part of admissions, the class of '93 would look more like the class of '83."

In the Spotlight

Women's soccer coach Lisa Melendy should be riding on the clouds after last week, during which she saw her troops defeat eighth-ranked Tufts 2-1 and won the Massachusetts State Lottery. Melendy is now one win and $5,000 richer after her number was drawn on Friday the 13th, the last drawing on a season ticket given to Melendy by last year's squash team as an end-of-the-season gift.

Ask Ann Dannhauer '90 of the women's cross-country team how her feet are doing -- they may be sore. Dannhauer, competing in the Albany Invitational last Saturday, lost both shoes during the 3.1-mile JV race due to extremely muddy course conditions. She ran the entire race barefoot, through woods and over pavement, to place second out of 97 competitors and lead the women's JV team to a victory over 24 other teams.

Neal Chesley '90 and Chris Hevesy '91 filled in for injured counterparts on Saturday in leading the Eph football squad to their record tenth consecutive win, a 35-7 triumph over Colby. Chesley rushed for 176 yards on 19 carries, including a 75-yard touchdown sprint, thus filling the gap left by injured back Jerry Procanik '92. Meanwhile, Hevesy took over the reins in the first quarter after quarterback Dan Dwyer went down with a season-ending knee injury, and steered the Ephs to five touchdowns in just over three quarters.

The men's soccer squad outshot a persistent Tufts squad 19-4 on Saturday, but it took overtime goals by Pete Lyn '91 and Sam McIlvain '90 to send the Jumbos to a 5-2 defeat. The win, which also included tallies by Doug Brooks '90 and Steve Bailey '91, advanced the Ephs to 8-2 overall and 7-0 in Division III play.

In the first game 15-0, Bard had a game point against the Ephs at 14-15, but couldn't convert. Two consecutive aces from Oyster (four overall) and a Bard mistake gave the Ephs the win at 17-15. Whelpton said the team's intensity fell because of Bard's offensive style.

"We clearly lost our intensity," she said. "We didn't expect a comeback. It's hard to beat a team 15-0, 15-0, when they don't play your game. Our defense is set up for kills and we weren't getting any."

Hedeman contributed with three kills, two tips and two aces, never gained the momentum they needed

Ephs regain momentum
Trinity was the Ephs' next victim. The Williams six controlled the entire match (15-2, 15-3), and the Bantams

The rematch against Wesleyan was intense from start to finish.

To win, Oyster led the way with two kills, two aces and two service winners. Hedeman and McConnell had two kills each.

The semi-finals against Union proved to be a challenge for the Ephs. They fell behind 3-9 in the first set. Two kills from Hedeman and Whelpton helped bring the team closer to Union, but it was an all-out team effort led by Hedeman (5 kills) that finally pulled out the match 15-12. Williams controlled the rest of the match, beating Union in the final game, 15-2.

under them. Junior fullback Katie "Club Med" Carr played her usual strong game, kicking the ball out of her defensive zone despite the fact that Albany Hoagae were almost always right on top of her. Spectator Bill White '90 exclaimed in response, "Come on Albany, let's play clean rugby... and get off my girlfriend!"

The second half began with renewed optimism on the Williams side. They were fired up and ball-hungry and it showed in the intensity of their play. In this half, the play took place almost entirely on Albany's side of the field. Speedy senior Timmie Friend, in her A-side debut, showed strong play with good hands and support. The A-side line, in general, worked very well together this half. Their passes connected and they burst into the ball, moving the ball forward through the Hoagae defense.

Jackie Graves '90 made her mark in this game with two strong breakthrough runs, and the Hoagae's attempts at offensive play were thwarted by fierce tackling by seniors Gina Coleman and Rebecca Mattson. Although the Albany women wanted desperately to bring the Williams women down, the Ephs persevered and defended their honor. "The game was ours," said proud father Tom Mattson, "but we're just not try-nicited enough."

have to come up with some big plays this week as Williams will finish their season with three games in the next five days.

This afternoon the Ephs will host sixth-ranked Mt. Holyoke at Cole Field. Holyoke enters the game at 12-2-2 and is a key game for the Ephs if they want to enter post-season play.

"This season the top 13 teams in New England will go to tournaments, and right now we're 12 or 13," said Melendy who had said before the season that a 9-5 record, the best possible for the Ephs, would not qualify a team for post-season play.

"If we can get just get in we're beginning to hit our stride. We're really communicating and passing well. We're really moving," she said. "We can still [get] in. I'd just love to get in and be a spoiler and beat some good teams."

To get in the Ephs will also have to beat Connecticut College on Thursday and Vassar on Saturday. Both games are on the road.

ALL MAJORS WELCOME

Captain Dan Calichman '90 goes up for the ball while teammate Peter Lyn '91 looks on during last Saturday's game against Tufts. The Ephs outshot the Jumbos 14-4 and won 5-2 in overtime. Their record stands at 8-0 in Division III. (Beliveau)

Footie '90, whose two conversions made the difference in the score.

The true difference in the match, however, was the play of flanker Dave Outcall '90, who created an overload on the line, received a pass and rambled twenty-five meters past three opponents for a try, and especially that of Jamie "Wreath" Slater '91, whose expert play at outside center consistently freed up the wings for long runs. Colin "ego" Holley '91 also showed his growing expertise at fullback, keeping play settled late in the second half as UMass threatened. This was certainly the Killer B's toughest match of the season, and the win shows that true improvement has occurred since their lone defeat to powerhouse Dartmouth.

A toll is exacted

In the C-side match, the rash of injuries on the upper sides now caused the youth corps to pay the price. Facing a legitimate C-side, these fifteen, many of them stand-ins from the D's, were overmatched, despite playing good rugby. The play of scrum-half Jamie "franchise" Art '93 and "Sweet" Pete Kirkwood '93 was outstanding in the 14-4 loss, as Kirkwood dashed forty meters around the wing for Williams' lone try.

A game fourth side from the White

Dogs was also vanquished in the third half of that match, as UMass recycled some B-siders to face the Dogs' team future. After another great Saturday of rugby, the Roadshow returned to the Valley fulfilled with the knowledge that, win or lose, never, ever, shoot the boot. Next weekend the WRFC travels to Siena College, where it hopes to explain one or two fine points of the game to the newly formed club. In three weeks, he prepared, as the force of darkness will invade the Valley for the most vital match of the year. Be sure to be there.

Women third, men fourth at Albany cross-country meet

by Heather Smith

The men's and women's cross-country teams met in highly challenging competition Saturday at the Albany Invitational in Albany, N.Y. Team work and outstanding individual performances, however, led to success in all four races the Ephs ran. Competing against 26 other teams, the Williams varsity men, led by captain Dale Johnson '90, raced to a fourth place finish, only two points behind the third place team. In the men's JV race, the Williams team captured second place behind a tough Brandeis squad. The women, too, ran strong races with the varsity team placing third behind Division II Millersville and Division III Ithaca. Ann Dannhauer '90 led the women's JV team, which posted 59 points, to a victory over 24 other teams.

The varsity men's team showed no signs of weakening Saturday although some of its top runners are still nursing injuries. Johnson said, "we ran much better as a team today. There was a lot of communicating going on... that's what we needed to see at this point in the season."

Indeed, all the Williams men seem to run well Saturday both individually and as a team. Despite the fact that the race started approximately 170 competitors, Williams runners sought each other out in the mass and ran in groups of two or three.

Running in a pond

Brendan Kease '92 said, "The first part of the race was just a bog." The start and finish of the race led across a large playing field. Due to the last few days of rain, that grassy area was very wet initially, but after several hundred runners had warmed up over it, the field had turned to mud. In planning their races, competitors had to contend with not only the slowing effect of the mud, but also the many narrow spots on the course where only one or two people could fit through at a time.

"An early lead was crucial... moves had to be made early," remarked Johnson. Johnson ran an outstanding race while leading his team to its fourth-place finish. He covered the five-mile course in 26:25 and placed 16th among nearly 170 competitors. Close behind him, freshman Tony Werner finished 18th in 26:31. Senior Nate Mevey-Finney remains a solid competitor for the Ephs this season, placing 22nd in 26:43. Sophomores Brian Coan and Bill McKinley wrapped up the Ephs scoring with impressive finishes in 31st and 55th place respectively. Freshman Seth McClenen, Williams' sixth man, completed the course 16 seconds behind McKinley, and senior Steve Brady crossed the line soon after in 27:51.

The men's JV team placed second in its race behind the Brandeis squad by earning 60 points. Greg Bierer '93 completed the muddy Albany course first for the Williams team, racing to a sixth place finish in 27:27. Steve Lane '93 followed in 10th place in 27:42 and four seconds at his heels was teammate Brian Moore '93 in 11th. Evan Driscoll '91 and Kease, Williams' fourth and fifth scorers, finalized the JV scoring in 13th and 20th places respectively.

A strong group of freshman runners, which Coach Pete Farwell described as a "solid pack of talented runners," support the men's team this year. That bodes well for the future of Williams men's cross-country. The freshman team has run undefeated this season against teams it met in the Williams Invitational last month and in a race against four prep-school teams two weeks ago.

Despite a typically strong performance, the women's varsity team suffered its first defeat Saturday at Albany. "I don't think we expected to take first," said sophomore Cindy Mundy. "We knew we were going up against really difficult competition."

With 28 teams competing, the Williams women could hardly hang their heads about an impressive third-place finish that stemmed from several outstanding individual showings. Nonetheless, the three runners managed to find each other amid approximately 190 competitors and ran as a fairly tight pack throughout the race. Running as a pack gave the Ithaca squad the edge over Williams. Millersville, a division II team, won the women's race with 39 points while Ithaca followed with 62 points and Williams captured third place with 85 points.

Coach Larry Bell said, "[It was] an excellent race for Anne [Platt '91] and Molly [Martin '92]... They ran very intelligent races. They didn't get caught up in the first-mile panic and nudged well in the middle of the race."

Platt led the women's team, placing fourth in 18:43. Martin crossed the finish line of the 3.1-mile course shortly after Platt, running to her 11th-place finish in 19:09. Cherie Macauley '92, Williams' third scorer, pocketed 20th place in 19:31. Only nine seconds behind her, captain Stacy Smith '90 completed an outstanding run in 26th place. Helene Wilburn '93 raced to 31st place as Williams' final scorer. Jon Raney '93 followed in a personal record time of 20:14 while Sue Donna '92 crossed the line in 20:54.

Shoeless Ann?

The muddy course added some unexpected circumstances for the women's JV team. Losing both her shoes in the mud early in the race, Ann Dannhauer '90 ran the entire race barefoot—through the woods and over pavement—to the finish. In Zola Budd style, Dannhauer placed second among 97 competitors Saturday.

Cindy Mundy '92 recalled, "It was difficult to get decent footing and a fast start." The team, however, seemed to overcome every obstacle en route to its victory over 24 other teams. Led by Dannhauer, the top Williams scores were close together. Andrea Cady '92 finished only ten seconds behind Dannhauer in 19:45 to claim third place. Following her, Elina Dugundji '91 placed 5th in 20:03. Mundy, ever improving, also ran well to her 18th-place finish in 20:47 and Williams' fifth scorer Nikki Kimball '93 added the last of the points to Williams' winning score.

This weekend the Williams cross-country teams will meet less challenging competition than they faced Saturday. The Little Three title will again be up for grabs, when both the men's and women's teams travel to Wesleyan this Saturday to race against Wesleyan and Amherst, Midfielder Ann Marie Marvin '91 outruns a Tufts opponent during last Saturday's game. The Ephs fell 2-1 in double overtime in what was their first loss of the season. Their 8-1 record will be challenged this week when they face Connecticut College and Westfield. (Thomas)

by Chris Blackburn

The WRFC followed the amber corridor of the Mohawk trail last Saturday morning into the heart of the Connecticut Valley, to face the hulking horde of hardened rugger that comprise the UMass RFC. On a pitch that was a microcosm of the autumnal New England countryside, complete with hills, lakes, and mud, the A-side strode forth to face yet another oversized and well-coached Division I opponent, in what was their last Division I match of the fall. Coming in 1-3 in the Division, Williams desperately wished to salvage some pride in this match, but once again the dauntless, oversized White Dogs were simply overmatched by a bigger and better side, to the tune of 30-12.

Do not think for a moment that the A-side was a mere punching bag, however. Decimated by injuries to hard-hitting forwards Dan "scrum machine" Hackett '91 and Mark "hog the covers" Elefante '91, the Williams scrum still played well, scoring one of the tries by driving the UMass lummever eight meters into their own try zone through the mud. Also in the first half, Jim "ex-crumbler" Kaufman scored a dramatic try on a 40-meter waltz from outside center, the only real high point of the day for the equally injured-crocod Williams line. With winger Phil "Crumble" Jack '90 decommissioned by a head injury and Kaufman forced to leave the game at the half because of a separated shoulder, the line was left at the mercy of the hard-charging UMass backs.

And where was Medusa?

This, then, was the plight of the A-side. Winning 12-8 at the half, but losing both the wind and injured players, the White Dogs faced a task of Herculean proportions. Unfortunately, destiny was predisposed against the noble Ephians this day. Perhaps it was not an epic fall, as when Leonidas led his small band of Spartans against the Persian hordes at Thermopylae, but the ingredients of legend were there. The valiant play of Chap "Minus" Peterson '90 and Kevin

"Daedalus" Cook '90 could not but strike a chord in the soul of any there that day.

The defeat left the A-side occupying the cellar of Division I along with Norwich and UVM, but the faithful fans of the WRFC should not despair. As everyone knows, there is only one match that counts, and it lies three short weeks away.

B-side now stands at 4-1

The B-side, faced with its now-familiar spoiler role, walked into the morass left by the A-side match with cause to worry. Both line and scrum were stripped of players due to the multiplicity of injured A-siders, and it was a fresh-faced fifteen that faced forth to fight for a feeling of felicity and fame. The club need not worry about its future, as this hodgepodge cast rose to the occasion, playing clean, controlled rugby en route to the 16-12 victory. The close (three tries apiece) match was decided by the boot of Dan "hog" Peterson '90 and Kevin "what was wrong with him, anyway?" fourth Eph touchdown of the game.

Like paper in fire

With the game virtually in hand, the vaunted Eph defense, which began last year's string of four consecutive shut-outs against Colby, decided to flex their muscles. Consecutive sacks by Ted Rogers '91, who turned in yet another solid performance, and Dan Yerxa '90 had White wondering where the team kept the Tylonol. Senior Rich Williams picked off a White job several plays later to give the warmly dressed Eph crowd something more to cheer about.

The resulting Eph drive resembled a Paul Reidy highlight film, as the sophomore backup carried three times before springing right and receiving a solid block by John Perryman '90 to beat the Mule defensive corps. Reidy's 49-yard touchdown trot, which came with 6:21 left in the contest, put the Ephmen up 35-7 and turned out to be the final score of the day for either squad.

White brought the Mules roaring back, as they quickly drove into Williams territory, but backup defensive end Doug Dreffler ended any threat of a Mule score when he pounced on a fumble in enemy backfield to set up the final drive of the game.

And an interesting drive it was, as freshman quarterback John Birkenes trotted onto the field for the first varsity action of his career. When a pair of ineffective runs and a huddling call left Birkenes cowering a third-and-27, he responded nicely, tossing a long spiral to classmate wideout Kevin Gilmarin, who was downed at the Colby 32. Several more runs brought the Ephmen inside the 10, but the game ended before Birkenes was able to punch the pigskin into the Mule end zone.

In any case, the contest left Williams still thinking of an undefeated season, although Farley noted that the position does exact a considerable toll. "It's tough to keep in and week out bang in there," Farley said, adding that "we've been a little bit spoiled by the streak. It carries a tag with it." The Ephmen will attempt to hold on to that tag when they travel this Saturday to the Green Mountain State, where they will face conference foe Middlebury.

Athletes of the Week

This week's recipients are Penny Foss '93 and Katherine Stearns '91 of the women's tennis team. Foss and Stearns paired up to win the number two doubles championship at New England's last weekend. In addition, Foss took the number two singles crown and Stearns took the number three singles crown. Williams was second overall at the championship, held at Amherst. Congrats, Penny and Katherine!

Ephs beat Mules, surpass '24 record

by Kerr Houston

Flashback to 1924: It's a chilly October day, and a small crowd is leaving Weston Field to crank their Fords after seeing the Williams College football squad race to their ninth straight victory. Now back to 1989: bells and whistles await a crowd that has just seen the most recent version of the Eph gridiron team down Colby 35-7 to advance its record to an unblemished 5-0 and to become the first Purple Valley product ever to surpass the 1924 streak.

'92, and watched Chesley bolt 75 yards through a muddy Colby secondary to post the first score of the afternoon.

Run into the ground?

After a Colby drive sputtered to end the opening stanza, Hevesy led the Ephmen deep into Mule territory on the strength of pitches to Chesley, handoffs to fullback Lars Hem '90, and a number of quarterback options that had Colby defenders scrambling to keep up. As the Williams line continued to open considerable holes,

Score by Quarters	1	2	3	4	Final
WILLIAMS	7	7	7	14	35
Colby	0	7	0	0	7

Team	Qtr	Time left	Scoring play
W	1	4:13	Chesley 75-yard run (Tapich kick) 7-0
W	2	6:46	Hem 4-yard run (Tapich kick) 14-0
C	2	:10	White 3-yard run (Sandblom kick) 14-7
W	3	:17	Hevesy 2-yard run (Tapich kick) 21-7
W	4	11:15	Hevesy 1-yard run (Tapich kick) 28-7
W	4	6:21	Reidy 49-yard run (Tapich kick) 35-7

The victory, which marked the first ten-year winning streak in the school's 109-year history of shoulder pads and hashmarks, did not come easily, however. The White Mules proved persistent, trailing only 14-7 as they jogged to the locker rooms at halftime, and they also proved dangerous, as Williams quarterback Dan Dwyer '92 suffered torn ligaments with 5:09 left in the first quarter, and is expected to miss the rest of the season. However, as Williams coach Dick Farley noted, "we have a little bit of depth and it's allowed us to march right on." Farley was proven correct on the second snap following Dwyer's injury, as backup quarterback Chris Hevesy '91 gave the pigskin to senior back Neal Chesley, himself replacing injured Jerry Procanik.

Hevesy fired a fourth-and-four dart to Hem at the Colby five for a first down, and Hem brought the drive to fruition on the next play, when he rumbled into the end zone for a 14-0 lead.

The teams traded ineffective drives before Farley's ship sprang another leak, this time in the form of a two-yard punt by Lindsey Vaughan '92. With Colby thus inheriting fine field position, Mule quarterback Chris White, who threw for 160 yards on the afternoon, led his squad to the Williams 3, and then dove three yards to light up the visitors' half of the scoreboard with ten seconds left in the half.

As they sat in the locker room while the Moo Cow band hit the field for its halftime show, Farley's troops found themselves without their starting quarterback and with a meager seven-point lead over a 1-3 band of visitors. And something happened. As Farley later put it, "we collected our thoughts at the half. It was pretty much the kids figuring they've worked too hard over the last month to let this slip away."

Eph gears start to turn. Although a fake punt prolonged the opening drive of the second half, Williams found itself unable to break the big play, and a Todd Strieter '90 boot left the Mules at their 28. White led his fired-up squad quickly downfield, but the potential tying campaign went down the drain when White fired incomplete on fourth-and-seven. The Ephmen responded with a 28-yard drive that carried them just past midfield, but they soon ran out of gas and Strieter holed the White Mules up with a punt that died on the Colby five. On the next play, defensive back David Weck '92 hauled in a White dart and returned it to the Colby 15. Weck's interception represented the first turnover of the game, and, four plays later, Brian Tapich '92 nailed the extra point following a three-yard Hevesy plunge behind the blocking of Hem and tackle Andy Allen '91 to grant the Ephmen a 14-point bulge. The third frame expired moments later, and an excited Williams defensive unit smothered the ensuing Colby drive, which finally ended with a punt that carried to the Williams 20. Hevesy found himself unable to get the Eph offense into gear, and Strieter punted, but Colby fumbled on its first play from scrimmage, giving the Ephmen possession at the Colby 30. A 29-yard Chesley jog set up a Hevesy keep that represented the fourth Eph continued on page 15

Women's tennis second at New Englands

by Dan Silverman

Williams women's tennis ended its season in style last week, beating a tough Skidmore squad on Tuesday and taking second at the New England Championships at Amherst last weekend.

At New Englands, according to Coach Gail Ramsay, "each player played her best tennis, if not all the way through, at least eighty or ninety percent of the time."

The Williams women picked the perfect time to peak. They finished with 33 points for the tournament. Only Tufts was better with 38.

The entire team played solid tennis, but the highlight of the weekend was the play of Katherine Stearns '91 and Penny

Foss '93. Stearns won the number three singles title. Foss took the number two singles crown and the pair teamed up to win the number two doubles championship.

Ramsay commented that Stearns was better than all her opponents and dominated her draw. Stearns beat Trinity's Laura Hubbard in the final 6-3, 3-6, 6-2.

In number two singles, "Penny Foss totally outclassed the whole field," Ramsay said.

The tournament was typical of Foss' overall season performance; she dropped just 22 games in 14 undefeated matches. Foss breezed through her New Englands draw to meet and beat Wellesley's Alexa Magna in the final 6-2, 6-0.

"I couldn't have asked for more. It was the perfect way to end the season," Foss said.

In doubles, Stearns and Foss upset number one seed Tufts in the semi-finals and beat Trinity 4-6, 6-0, 6-0, to win the championship.

Another great performance was turned in by captain Amy Davidson '90 who took second in the number one singles and made the semis in number one doubles with partner Beth Laxson '91.

Ramsay said, "Amy played the best tennis of her career," in this, her last Eph tournament.

Another shining Eph moment was junior Lisa Brayton's come-from-behind victory over Wheaton's Jackie Michel in her number four singles quarterfinal. Brayton was down a set and 0-3 in the second when she took the next twelve games to win the match.

The Ephs' regular season ended Tuesday with a 5-4 surprise win over Skidmore, leaving Williams with a 9-3 mark for the season. Williams won the first four singles matches only to lose the last two singles and two doubles matches. The burden to win came down on the number one doubles team of Davidson and Laxson, who were victorious in a tough three set 6-3, 4-6, 6-2.

"Overall, it was a great season. The women worked really hard, paced themselves well, and did everything I asked them to do," Ramsay said.

Volleyball team wins Williams invitational

by Rhonda Goodman

There's one word that aptly describes the Williams women's volleyball team: intense. The Ephs won the Williams Invitational last Saturday, beating Wesleyan, Bard, Trinity, and Union in the process. Their record now stands at 21-2.

The rematch against Wesleyan was intense from start to finish. The Williams squad lost the first game, 9-15, after several mistakes. The second game was the same picture, but with the roles reversed: the Ephs won, 15-5.

The final game was crucial for both teams. Williams fell behind 0-4 and stayed behind until a net violation gave the Ephs the lead. Three kills from Holly Hodeman '92 (nine kills overall during the game), a tremendous double-hit overhead from Shelley Whelpion '90 (seven kills overall) off of a powerful spike from Wesleyan hitter Robin Crestwell '90, and several Wesleyan mistakes (such as net violations and out-of-bounds balls) gave Williams the win, 15-13. Coach Roberts said the will to win from the team made the difference.

"It was pure determination," she said. "Both teams were playing great volleyball. The girls really wanted this one."

Catherine Oyley '93, who had four aces in the Wesleyan match, said the home crowd was another reason the team wanted to win. Many of the players' parents were among the spectators.

"We just didn't want to lose in front of the home crowd," she said. Kathy McConnell '91, who had three kills overall, said the team's constant intensity was the deciding element.

"Even when we made a mistake, we gave 110 percent," she said. "Unlike some of the games before, our intensity was consistent throughout the entire match."

Lost intensity

The Ephs' concentration did falter some during the early stages of the invitational. In the team's opening match against Bard College, the unit blew a 14-3 lead after beating their opponent

W. soccer comes back from behind, defeats Tufts

by Kevin Greenberg

For the first time this season the women's soccer team finished a week with a record over .500. The Lady Kickers had only one game this week.

The team managed to win that game, coming from behind to down eighth-ranked Tufts 2-1 on Saturday. The win raised the Ephs' record to 6-5.

Williams fell behind the Jumbos early in the game when Tufts scored on a corner kick 11:23 into the action. "They scored on a corner kick, and I mean on the corner kick. She kicked the ball from the corner and it was a perfect shot to the far post," said coach Lisa Melendy.

"It was a really good shot, but I should have had it. It hit off my fingertips and went in," goalkeeper Sara Treworgy '93 said.

The Ephs had not come from behind in any of their 10 previous games. Treworgy said that the team was becoming depressed until sophomore midfielder Jen Plansky scored six minutes later.

"We were outplaying them. It was difficult [to fall] behind but I thought we were still in the game. And as soon as Jen scored it gave everyone a big boost. It was a beautiful goal," Treworgy said.

Midfielder Sharon Glick '93 had taken the ball down the left hand side and passed the ball out to Plansky at the top of the penalty box. She stopped the ball and put it just inside the near post from about 20 yards out.

"It pumped everybody up," said Plansky. "The team needed to know that we could come from behind."

The comeback paused at that point, as neither team scored for the rest of the half despite a plethora of Williams scoring attempts. Williams took 19 shots in the game while Tufts only managed five.

"Tufts has had a pretty similar season to ours. They don't have a great scorer but they have a strong defense," Melendy said.

The Ephs found a crack in the Tufts defense, however, with 6:55 to go in the game. Williams took a restart right outside the Jumbo penalty box. The ball bounced around and striker Liz Nasser '92 scored from 12 yards out. It was the first goal of the season for Nasser, who tallied seven for the Ephs in 1988.

Both Williams goals came in a new offensive formation for the team. The Ephs came out with three forwards and three fullbacks instead of the four fullback-two striker unit they had been using. Plansky is the player who was given more offensive responsibilities and it paid off in a goal.

But the new formation did not affect the defense, according to the goalkeeper. "We were very solid defensively--because we have always been an excellent defensive team and because ten always came back and was playing defense when we needed her," said Treworgy. "Jen Plansky played the best game she has ever played both offensively and defensively for us," said Melendy.

Women ruggers have mixed day at Albany

by Amanda Gallagher and Rebekah Timin

Travelling out of the sunny Purple valley to cold, wet Albany last weekend, the Williams women's rugby team played two tough but disappointing games. The B-side lost the opening game 12-0 to an aggressive Cortland team while the A-side had a scoreless encounter with the bulky Albany Women's Club.

Playing against the more experienced Cortland Twisties, the B-side nonetheless had a strong defensive game. From the very beginning, scrumhalf Andrea Walter '92 showed her Twisty counterpart no mercy, taking her down time and time again. Megan "Just Say No" Hayes '93 tackled anything that dared come her way. Despite the impressive last-ditch boots of Mary "Pumpkin" Carney '93, and the defensive wall formed by the petite yet ferocious Amy Sac '92, Kristen Van Home '93, and Stephanie Phillips '92, the braided Cortland ruggers managed to penetrate the try zone.

With the score 6-0 at the half, the Killer B's were not discouraged. The omnipresent Mary "Oh So Scary"

'93 was a part of every play. Carney saved many near-tries but was unable to prevent the disputed mid-half try. Hayes, clearly under the ball on that try, channelled her frustration at the delectable call into ferocious tackling. Despite a tough scrum and a speedy line, the Killer B's could not score.

A scoreless deadlock

The A-side game was characterized by the same inability to score. The scrum played a consistently strong game, with hooker Caitlin "Where there's a whip, there's a" Mann '92 winning most of the hooks. Play in the first half occurred mostly behind the Williams 22-yard line. Still, despite Albany's proximity to the Williams try zone, the Williams ruggers prevented them from scoring time and time again.

"Albany just could not penetrate our try zone, though they really wanted to," Line Captain Kathie Lapey '90 said.

Liz Martin '90 played tough, tackling anyone who came near her, as did Rebekah Timin '90, who saved two tries by diving

Housing meetings almost unattended

by Dan Silverman

It often seems that complaining about the Williams housing process is the student body's favorite pastime. However, if the turnout at three gripe sessions held by an ad hoc committee formed by the College Council and the Committee on Undergraduate Life was any indication, reports of student feelings have been greatly exaggerated.

No one came to the first two sessions and just a dozen came to the last. The purpose of these meetings was to get student input on problems in the Williams housing situation so that appropriate changes can be made.

Although no students came to complain at the first meeting, one person did show up at Brooks Rogers looking for an art history film about the Empire State Building.

The third meeting was slightly better advertised and a discussion ensued.

College Council president Sfrand Raghunandan '90 began the meeting by explaining that the Housing Committee is doing a comprehensive overview of the housing system. Its goal is to develop a fair method of inter-house transfers and swaps to allow students to live where they want to live while discouraging a sophomore class ghetto in Mission Park.

"The system of freshman entries and upperclass houses won't be touched. However, we are looking at changes in house government, the affiliation process, transfers and swaps," Raghunandan said.

Affiliating entries and houses Raghunandan also said that there is a possibility of affiliating freshman entries with upperclass houses to improve unity between classes. An entry would plan social and volunteer events with the same upperclass house for the whole year. It would be an official entry/house competition similar to the informal one that already exists with the house its J.A.'s lived in the previous year.

Students expressed their discontent with the current system of swaps and transfers. Most of the numerous and different problems involved difficulties with the row houses, Dodd House and the Berkshire Quad. The main problems seemed to arise from a lack of uniformity in the regulations concerning house governments and the transfer of upperclassmen from one house group to another.

Students made calls for an all-campus housing lottery, easier affiliation swaps for upperclassmen, the dropping of the house group system in the freshman inclusion process and a formal system for room picks by students away from campus second semester.

Overcrowding

Students also discussed the issue of overcrowding caused by the unusually large size (544 students) of the Class of 1992. Some expressed the hope that the Admissions Department would have made the Class of '93 (519 freshmen) smaller than average to compensate.

"Every student organization associated with housing should write to [Director of Admissions] Phil Smith and say, 'What the hell are you doing?'," Fitch-Currier president Kevin Conn '90 said.

The housing committee will take the complaints and suggestions put forward by students with them as they tour other campuses such as Vassar and Amherst colleges to investigate housing operations there. Because of low attendance at last week's meetings, further student input will probably be requested before any changes are made in Williams' system.

Raghunandan said he hoped the housing committee will be able to complete its review of Williams housing by the end of this semester. If changes are going to be made, the committee will publish a handbook explaining the system and its new aspects before the inclusion process begins for next year.

If changes are made, Raghunandan said he expected complaints from people who can remember the way it was in the "good old days." But Raghunandan said that the committee will stand by changes they think will be good for the system in the long run.

The Stetson Apartments on Stetson Road are perhaps the nearest faculty homes to the center of campus, but faculty members are complaining that not enough affordable housing opportunities exist for them. (Thomas)

Profs decry lack of rental opportunities

by Linda Good

This year, the Williams College faculty faces a rental housing overflow problem which is growing to such proportions that administration and faculty are referring to it as a "crisis."

The issue dominated the discussion at the most recent faculty meeting.

Housing Director Thomas McEvoy placed the number of faculty who applied for rental housing and were denied it due to lack of space at fourteen. "The number," he said, "does not include administrative staff. It reflects strictly those who applied through this office who are new to the community or who lived in Williamstown and applied for on-campus housing."

Assistant Professor of History Joel Wolfe was one of the junior faculty members placed in this position.

"The procedure is complicated, and I'm not completely sure I understand how it works," he said. "It is not completely clear to the junior faculty members that the procedures are followed scrupulously."

Assistant Professor of Political Science George Crane agreed with Wolfe. He said, "I understand that there is a point system, but we are never told how many points we have relative to anyone else."

"The most important thing as I see it is complete information," he said. "They need to get a sense of people's desires and to see what the pattern is of those who are getting housing, and what the pattern of availability is. None of us have seen a complete record of availability is," said Crane.

Frustration among junior faculty Wolfe added, "There is frustration among junior faculty. Most of the senior faculty are settled."

Professor of Economics and Provost of the College Gordon Winston described the situation as a problem of the college's location and the local market. He said, "The college has three programs for helping faculty and administrative staff with housing in recognition of the size and isolation of the college and the importance of recruiting new faculty members. We make available building lots to buy; we give advantages on mortgage terms; and we provide rental housing. The rental housing is at issue."

"There are ciphers in units in the community that the college owns, and there appeared last spring a very real increase in the number of people who wanted/needed rental housing," he said.

Wolfe said he believed that the root of the problem stemmed from a misunderstanding on the part of administrators. He said, "The consensus among junior faculty is that [the college should]

Brown experiences earthquake firsthand

by Damon Hemmerdinger

Former Assistant Professor of Political Science Wendy Brown.

Wendy Brown, a former member of the Williams political science department who is now Director of the Feminist Studies Research Institute at the University of California at Santa Cruz, survived the recent earthquake in the San Francisco Bay area unscathed. Brown was in her office running a staff meeting when the quake hit at 5:04 p.m. on October 24.

"We jumped under tables and desks and watched the office fall apart," she said. "If we hadn't, we'd have been clubbed by books and flying computers. It took us a while to dig out and get to the door."

Brown's home suffered almost no damage. Although her chimney did collapse, the house received a "green tag" from the Department of Inspection. A green tag means that a house is safe for occupation, while a red tag signifies major structural damage that usually results in the house being condemned.

One of her colleagues whose house was destroyed is staying at her home. Brown said that this experience brought to light one of the major long-term problems facing the region.

"The housing shortage in Santa Cruz was already horrible. The question now is what to do with 10,000 homeless when there are no spare apartments."

The university itself suffered little damage, according to Brown. Most buildings received green tags soon after the quake and classes have restarted.

"It's hard to focus, though. You concentrate for a second and then you think about the cosmos," she said. "There's a lot of shakiness. Emotions are high. People cry easily. There's a lot of both care-taking and short tempers."

Santa Cruz badly damaged

For Brown, the most devastating losses were to the old, downtown part of Santa Cruz.

"What's so devastating is that the oldest part of the town has fallen apart or is being demolished. Santa Cruz is, or was, centered around an open air mall. A lot of the buildings were built around the turn of the century. The history that showed up in the buildings has fallen apart. It's gone forever. It's hard to know whether the character of the town will be restored," she said.

Clean up of the area is underway, she said. "The day after the quake, it was like a war zone. Now, you hear cranes and workers. The process of dealing with

by Adam Cherensky

In response to concerns about the safety of women at Williams, a student has formed a free self-defense class for freshmen women.

William April '90 said that the need for the class is obvious. He said, "Why do you feel a need to wear pants to go outside? It's cold."

Because of the basic need he perceives for self-defense, April and Health Educator Donna Denelli-Hess have started teaching such a class from 8-10 p.m. in the Dodd House living room on Monday nights.

April realized the need for this class last year while he was working for the Department of Justice. At work he encountered the FBI's Uniform Crime Report, an annual compilation of data on crime in the United States. When he looked at it, he said he was shocked at how much rape was going on and how little of it was reported.

The report stated that although 100,000 rapes were reported in the U.S. in 1988, only one out of five rapes are ever reported, and about 97 percent of date rapes are never reported. "If the numbers aren't scary enough, I don't know what is," April said.

He sought out Denelli-Hess' help with the class so that he could cover not only the physical aspect of self-defense, but the social aspect as well.

For the first half-hour of each class, Denelli-Hess discusses the physical aspect of women's self-defense without the social aspect. "People [would] go away with a little bit of information and get into trouble with it because they're not watching out for themselves or each other."

Although martial arts are taught, the class is not anti-men, Denelli-Hess said. "No matter what sex, you ought to be able to feel safe on any part of this campus. It's part of a whole empowerment issue."

As for the martial arts aspect of the class, April said that aikido-jitsu is well-suited for women. "It doesn't necessi-

Busted!

Who hasn't dreamed of this sweet revenge on the mad ticketers? Last week, two huge, fake parking tickets turned up on a couple of security's brand new cruisers. This ticket, number 100,000,008, was given for "Giving too many tickets." The security office, however, appeared to get a big kick out of the whole affair, even asking the Record if it would like to take advantage of this stellar photo opportunity. But, as the ticket says, the next offense will merit a fine. The next time security pulls a fire alarm, they better make sure they are parked legally. (Thomas)

Students should voice housing concerns

It's every host's worst nightmare: a carefully planned party where nobody shows up. Although College Council and the Dean's Office are not known for their wonderful soirees, they had good reason to believe that the three housing "gripe sessions" held last week would be well-attended.

At the first two meetings, however, college officials outnumbered students, and the third was only slightly better, with an audience of a dozen or so. Does this indicate that all Williams students are satisfied with their housing situations? Certainly not.

It is no mystery that there are a number of problems in the housing process. Every year, scores of students complain about the freshman inclusion process, room draw and the off-campus housing lottery. So why, if there is so much discontent, were there so few students at the gripe sessions?

The reasons are many. First of all, the College Council carefully scheduled the meetings during a week of midterm exams, when students were more concerned about moving into Sawyer Library for a few days than applying for a transfer of affiliation or off-campus housing spot.

In addition, the Council and the Dean's Office made the mistake of thinking that a general meeting would bring all the student complaints out of the woodwork. It might have been more effective to ask house presidents and Junior Advisors to take down complaints at snacks. If Mohammed won't come to the mountain...

Nevertheless, the greatest portion of the blame belongs to the student body at large. The administration was going out of its way to listen to student complaints, and they must have been shocked at the minuscule number of people who took them up on their offer. With such a response, it hardly seems likely that they will feel encouraged to try such events again.

Seniors may have felt they had little to gain by attending the meetings, and freshmen may not yet have been concerned with next year's housing, but just hoping that the problems will go away if they are ignored long enough is foolish. The College Council needs to try a little harder to discover just what students want to see changed, and students themselves must be willing to put in a little effort to see these problems alleviated.

Too many critters in Morgan East

Editor's Note: The following letter was sent to President Oakley on October 22 with the carcass of a mouse encased. A copy of the letter, including a mouse skeleton, was received by the Record shortly thereafter.

President Francis Oakley:

In accepting the position of Junior Advisor here in Morgan East last Spring, I was fully prepared to facilitate the assimilation of the Class of 1993, the bi-centennial class, into the Williams community of bipeds. No obstacle seemed too great! This past week, however, I encountered a pungent odor a-waftin' in my room. It smelled bad...really bad. I was compelled by my curiosity, cultivated over the course of three years of intellectual pursuits here at Williams College, to investigate. Just call me Sherlock.

The smell was definitely organic, inhuman, and as we were soon to discover, that of a quadruped (varmint). I, Matt Esos '91, with the collaboration of Mary Mihalopoulos '93 and "Camilla" David Frazier '93, excavated in the first and hopefully the last of the Morgan East digs, the festering remains of not less than 20 (count 'em) dead mice (a.k.a. Reithrodontomys humilis). See insert. This was from my closet, just the beginning, merely the tip of the ice-berg. Had we had more, better implements of destruction and more zyzden music, Morgan would be rubble.

We want action! Either provide adequate means of escape for the ill critters in the walls, or get rid of those stinky, flea-infested-ugly-mutant-mice. We're carbon copying this declaration of the subversive rodent element in my walks to Buildings and Grounds, the Board of Trustees, the Record, the Boston Globe, Mom, and the EPA. You can run but you can't hide! If you thought the Jenness House takeover in '87-88 was extremist, you ain't seen nothing yet, baby.

See ya' in a moment rodent,

Unfair off-campus housing system needs drastic reforms

by Brad Gendell

The second question posed to upperclassmen upon their return from summer -- after the obligatory "How was your summer?" -- is "Where are you living?" While it's not a trick question and should not induce anxiety for most students, my answer of "Woodbridge" was greeted by everything from quizzical stares to laughter.

My room has been described on WCFM as "Kafkaesque," and in private has been repeatedly damned with faint praise. "It's kind of cute in a squat sort of way."

Why, then, am I living there in this, my final and putatively most glorious year at Williams? The reason is my partner in the housing process, Don MacKinnon, and I were going to live off-campus but we were not granted permission by the college administration.

I knew about the need to get permission and did everything I thought I needed to do to get it. But the process is structured in such a way that even well-meaning students acting in good faith can find themselves coming up short in the end.

My ordeal began back in January when applications for off-campus housing were first due. I did not yet have a lease on an apartment and was understandably reluctant to submit my application for off-campus housing which would automatically make me ineligible for on-campus room draw. In normal years, juniors have to deal with this dilemma and either retreat to the security of on-campus room draw or face the jungle that is the Williamstown real estate market.

Last year, however, the housing squeeze caused by the large freshman class gave juniors the luxury of both participating in room draw and seeking off-campus housing: the college needed as many rooms as possible and was therefore willing to grant off-campus privileges after the official deadline.

Assistant Dean of the College Andrew Hernandez was quoted in the Record last March as saying that "If other juniors were to come to me in the next couple of weeks to live off campus, I would be inclined to let them." In private conversations he was even more enthusiastic, saying that almost any senior without a disciplinary problem could get permission to live off campus.

Operating under this assumption, I both participated in room draw and continued my search for off-campus housing, confident in my ability to get the necessary permission. Shortly thereafter, Don and I found an apartment on Hoxsey Street which, though adequate enough, had very close living quarters.

We checked with Hernandez again to make sure it was not a problem if we delayed our off-campus application and continued looking. He said it was not.

I come neither to bury Andy nor to praise him. His actions were the result of a miry system.

Midsummer, with all other possibilities exhausted, we opted to sign the lease for cramped quarters on Hoxsey Street. I called Hernandez, who then lowered the boom. He explained that we could not have permission to live off campus because the large number of students living off campus had angered townpeople and that combined with an increase in students going abroad, the college was now left with empty rooms.

Hernandez said that I was the fifth or sixth call he had gotten about off-campus housing that week and that, as with the others, he could make no exceptions. He left us with only a faint glimmer of hope by suggesting that if some other student's lease fell through, he might be able to lottery off their spots.

With only this modicum of hope, we contacted our landlady who asked, "Who is this Andy Hernandez, anyway?" and gave him a call while Don and I tried to come up with a strategy. It was all in vain, however, because after the landlady talked to Hernandez, she revoked our lease and gave the apartment to two other students whose deal had fallen through. She had gotten their names from Hernandez.

How could we end up not getting permission to live off-campus when we had been told all along it was no problem? I posed the question to Hernandez with specific reference to his public statements in the Record about off-campus would be furthure who have leases or are willing to risk their on-campus draw to improve their chances at getting permission to go off campus. The second would allow people who already have rooms to enter a lottery for the remaining spots available.

The first deadline would take everyone up to some standard limit, say 100 students versus a total of 120 or so this year, and the second deadline would have a variable limit depending upon the housing situation that year. The advantage of doing this later is increased knowledge of how many students will be abroad or taking personal leaves -- decisions which are made later in the year.

Finally, I want to emphasize that whatever system is developed to deal with off-campus housing, it should be as consistent as possible. I am not suggesting that rules must remain etched in stone, but the more the results of the system match our expectations from past experience, the more satisfied all the participants will be. Trying to create a system that will accommodate the contingencies of the next, say, five years, rather than the present year-to-year changes would help.

The second group, of which I was a member, does not have a place by January of junior year and is reluctant to give up eligibility for room draw for fear they may not get decent housing off campus. I suggest having two deadlines, one in January after co-op draw and one in April after room draw. The first deadline

At the recent football game between Dartmouth and Harvard, nearly 200 Dartmouth freshmen ignored warnings from college officials and rushed the opposing stands at halftime. Cheered on by upperclassmen, the students gathered at the bottom of the stands on the Dartmouth side, leaped over the concrete retaining wall, ran across the field and climbed into the stands on the opposite side. Three of the freshmen were apprehended by Harvard security guards, but all three were released later that day. They now face disciplinary action from Dartmouth. The Dartmouth administration is cracking down on the tradition of rushing the stands because it has led to violence in previous years. This was the first time this season that students had chosen to rush the stands.

More Dartmouth

Dartmouth students trying to fight off the chills of winter in New Hampshire will have to look a little further this year. However, Hox Tub has closed its doors until at least next June. The establishment closed last spring, but has remained closed as negotiations for its sale have begun. "Dartmouth students have always been enthusiastic about the hot tubs and I hope that relationship continues," said a stockholder in the business. One of the potential new owners has said he would like the new business would focus on relaxation and stress management. "AIDS rumors have hurt the hot tub business," he said, "but with a more informed public, business should suffer."

North Adams State College

The amatory ambitions of a peeping Tom were spotted when he was seen staring in the window of a second-floor women's bathroom at a North Adams State dormitory house. The man was seen by a male student who said, "I went to close my bedroom window, and I saw this man just hanging from the girl's gutter and looking in their window. I just knew it was a peeping Tom." When the man realized he had been seen, he jumped in the window, ran through the house, and escaped out the back door. Police were able to apprehend the man shortly afterwards because of the detailed descriptions given by the students. He is currently under 30-day observation. How appropriate...

Harvard University

Those crazy Harvard students are starting to get radical again. But this time they're not protesting abortion, South Africa or the Vietnam War. Instead, a group of students who call themselves the Society of Nerds and Geeks (SNG) are protesting for midnight shuttles to biology labs and a library that is open for 24 hours. The group of about 25 students was formed to counteract anti-intellectualism on campus. They intend to sponsor such events as nerdy movies ("Real Genius" and "Revenge of the Nerds"), guest lectures (Jaime Escalante, the Los Angeles high school calculus teacher), and a computer dating service that will match people up according to their intellectual interests. What will they think of next?

Hunt named summer theater festival director

by Mary Moule

After a ten-month interim following the death of former director Nikos Psacharopoulos, Peter Hunt has been chosen as the new artistic and executive director of the Williamstown Theatre Festival.

"[Psacharopoulos] built the theatre; he spent almost 35 years of his life making it a nationally renowned summer theatre festival," Hunt said. "Artists of great caliber are anxious to work there, and young people see it as a great training ground. All that is due to Nikos' talent and vision."

Because of the legacy that Psacharopoulos built, it may be difficult for someone to follow in his place. Hunt said that the former director's national reputation will certainly affect his job. "It will be easier in that I will have that to build on. But on the other hand, it will be really tough for a number of years during which I will constantly be compared to him," Hunt said.

With this in mind, the WTF board has chosen someone who can provide continuity: Hunt was friends with and had worked with the former director for many years.

"I met Nikos backstage at a production in 1957, when I had just gotten to Yale," Hunt said. "After that, he was my teacher and my friend, then we became competitive. Our relationship has run the gamut since then. We've yelled and screamed at each other; we've also helped each other. We've seen a lot of life together."

Started as lighting designer Hunt has worked with Psacharopoulos since he first came to WTF in 1958 as a lighting designer. In fact, Hunt's career in the theatre started in that area. "At Yale, I was intending to be an actor, but to please my father I got into lighting design -- which I really enjoyed." He continued to do that for many years, first at Yale, then professionally.

"Then, in certain places, certain producers decided that I should direct. Before I realized it, I was directing Broadway shows, winning awards, and then directing a feature in Hollywood," Hunt said. In 1972, he won a Tony Award for the stage production of "1776." When that led to the film version, which he also directed, he won a Christopher Award, and his film career was firmly established.

With this background, Hunt said he hopes he can make a positive contribution to the theatre festival.

"I grew up in this theatre. One of the reasons I was hired was to keep tate a lot of brute strength like karate or judo. A lot of the movements are really flowing movements, so they seem to translate well to women," he said.

April emphasized that women must be able to respond appropriately to uncomfortable situations. "Just because somebody is a little fresh doesn't mean he deserves a broken nose."

However, April pointed out that while some responses may be too physical, women are often too passive rather than too active. "Somewhere along the line, women forgot how to be offended. There are times when they should be angry, violently angry, even," he said.

Furthermore, Wolfe said, "If you build more units and charge the market rate, there is no effect. If you build more housing you drive down the market rate as supply approaches demand. It's a question of at what price is the college renting them?"

"If they are rented at cost, you have the subsidy. Renting them at market rate will avoid the appearance of a subsidy. The college is a huge landlord, and can afford the competitive market rate. The IRS will not demand what it costs to build them, but will demand the market rate," Wolfe said.

'Integral issue' He added that the college was facing a potential disaster if junior faculty dis-

Before the first class was given on Oct. 23, April and Denelli-Hess gave a trial class to some members of the Feminist Alliance. Two women who attended that class were Joanna Betz '91 and Adele Home '91.

Betz said that she thought that the class was successful. She said that Denelli-Hess told the women some appalling but educational statistics, such as the fact that ninety percent of date rapes occur in your own room or house.

"[If the physical aspect of the class] raised my confidence level. If someone attacks me, I should try to fight as hard as I can," Betz said. She added that the physical education department should offer a women's self-defense course for credit.

Home thought that the class was valuable because women need to know how to defend themselves. She said that although the defense strategies give women a sense of empowerment, more needs to be done. "You can't really learn [self-defense] in one class and know how to react on a really quick basis."

Both April and Denelli-Hess acknowledged this weakness in the class. "In two hours I can't really change [women's] lives," April said.

However, there is a question as to whether this class will exist next year in any form. Dean of Freshmen William Darrow is sponsoring the class at April's request, but there are no guarantees that it will continue after April graduates this year.

"This course is happenstance this year [because April offered to teach it]. I have no reason to believe that we can continue doing this next year," Darrow said.

On the other hand, Denelli-Hess was more optimistic about the class' future prospects. "I think that there are other resources [here] that could play that role [of teaching self-defense] when William April is gone," she said.

If the class does take place next year, Denelli-Hess said she hopes to add a refresher piece and an evaluation component to the initial two-hour class.

situation. [As it stands now], it does not look hopeful for us for next year," he said.

Chair of the Political Science Department Raymond Baker felt that the problem was not a housing office problem as much as it was a college-wide problem. He said, "From the position of a department chair, we had an unusual number of new hires. I operated under the assumption that college housing could be offered as it has traditionally been able to. This was not the case this time."

"My impression is that there is a housing problem for new faculty. Some tenured faculty have not moved out as fast as they used to because the market is so bad," he said.

Big lamps signal end of college's three-year lighting improvement

by Ellen Schneider

Williams has emerged from the lampless dark ages into an era of fancy fixture lighting. New pole lamps illuminate the areas around Sawyer Library and Mission Park. Large lighting fixtures have appeared on a few buildings around campus lately, signaling the final stage in the large outdoor lighting project begun in early 1987.

Pole lamp installation is nearly completed with only twenty-three lamps left to be set up, largely in the areas of Agard, Makepeace, Mears, and Seelye houses. The equipment is all on campus and the work will be done before winter. Then the project will focus on the building fixtures.

Forty-eight fixtures will be installed, 23 in the science and Berkshire quads and 25 in the Greylock quad and around Prospect House. As with the pole lamps, much care was taken in selecting the style and model of the fixtures. A colonial style will be mounted on such traditional buildings as Currier House, while a contemporary design will be used on modern houses like Prospect.

The fixtures are not cheap. For materials alone, the pole lamps cost roughly $14,000 apiece and the building fixtures cost $1,000 each. According to Dean of the College Stephen Fix, the entire lighting program was allocated $1,500,000 in January 1988 by the board of trustees.

Acting Director of the Physical Plant John Holden said that the cost, when considered over a long period of time, is not so prohibitive. "The initial cost may seem heavy, but the lights are seen as permanent fixtures and they are a very effective solution to the lighting problem," he said.

For example, Holden said the fixtures will use a 175-watt metal halide bulb, one of the most efficient bulbs available, which generally lasts about two years and costs about $50 to $75 each. The fixtures are also equipped with photo-electric cells, which eliminate the need for manual operation and are energy-efficient because theoretically the lights will be on only from dusk to daylight.

According to Fix, the new lighting fixtures will be invaluable in aiding campus security. "The fixtures provide more light than a pole," he said, "especially in areas such as the science and Berkshire quadrangles."

The new lights have so far only received praise. Students polled on the new lighting generally have reacted favorably toward it. "In terms of public opinion, it is one of the most favorably received projects we have ever done," Holden said.

Blot out the stars?

There are some concerns that the view of the night sky will be somewhat diminished due to light pollution from glare. Professor of Astronomy and department chair Karen Kwitner said that the campus lighting should be a minimal problem as long as the lights are shielded and do not throw light up as well as down.

New prospectus nice, but Ephs still remember all that 'snow'

by Eric Chiu

"It has been called the best college in America." — the new Williams prospectus.

This information, based on U.S. News and World Report's annual college rankings, may be a little dated. But if a snazzy prospectus were part of U.S. News' mystical formula, Williams would probably be on top again.

The brand new, completely reshot information guide has been sent to 27,000 potential members of the Class of 1994. However, many present Ephs, some who remember the Fake Snow Capers of last winter, were nonplussed by the slick softcover book.

Ivy Chen '90 was featured in a shot which showed her intensely playing on her cello. She said, "I saw it and I didn't know if I wanted my picture in something like that. It felt a bit wrong because that's not what this college is like."

Jane Knight '92 was in a photograph which showed her strolling with a bundle of wood with two of her friends, one of whom had a black dog on a leash. "The [the photographers] brought the wood out of the back of a truck. There wasn't any snow last year so they had to bring that. They even gave us jackets and coats so that it would look natural."

She added, "It was obviously staged. You could tell it was not real." Another student, who asked not to be identified, said, "You could tell the picture wasn't real, because the dog didn't have any snow on its paws or anything. That was a dead giveaway."

The new booklet, in one of its many Number Games-esque fact pages, also emphasizes the increase in the number of minorities on campus. "Since the late 1960's, it has seen an increase of nearly 600 percent in the number of black students on campus ... These students are fully integrated in the mainstream of campus life."

The traditional images of the "well-rounded" student appear consistently in the prospectus. In one photograph a student is shown preoccupied with transcribing the pages of a medieval text. On the desk she works on are various objects that describe her interests: a Sony Walkman, a copy of Caudron, the women's literature publication, and James Gleick's book Chaos.

According to the Admissions Office, the prospectus is reshot only every five years. So everyone pray for a snowy winter of 1994 and don't forget your 3-D glasses.

However, not everyone had negative opinions of the booklet. Christian Sheridan '93 said, "I found it incredibly stimulating." Tim Huang '91 said that he was so moved by the contents that he could not put it down. "It made me want to apply," he said.

The guide's popularity is also demonstrated by the constant disappearance of them from the Admissions Office at Mather House. According to the office, over 20 prospectuses, clearly marked as copies not for distribution, have been taken from Mather since September.

The glossy, spiral-bound, 48-page prospectus differs greatly from those of previous years. The new cover, in contrast to last year's reproduction of Dante's Inferno, shows two students happily chatting away in front of Chapin Hall. There has been a shift to a more eye-pleasing green from the previous brick red.

This was the first time the prospectus had been prepared by an outside organization, in this case the consulting firm of North Charles Street Organizers. The cost of the prospectus is still about five dollars per book, considered average for comparable colleges.

continuity. It's basically an evolutionary process. I'd like for it to grow, just as Nikos would have liked," Hunt said. With this in mind, he said he plans to work from the past, improving and building on what Paschopoulos has done.

Paschopoulos was known as a dominating force in the theater, and Hunt said that he will basically follow this lead. "Any theatre needs to be a benevolent dictatorship, for it's very important that there is a singularity of vision," Jack Warner [of Warner Brothers fame] used the expression "the fish thinks from the head," which implies that I do need to set the tone and the vision for the theatre," Hunt said. "The difference is that I will need more of a consensus from the board. I still have to prove myself, so I can't say things arbitrarily. Other voices need to be heard."

Some changes are likely, however. "I'm a different person, for better or for worse. The theatre will begin to take on my personality as it had taken on his in the past," Hunt said.

"I don't think people on the outside will see that much of a difference. Ultimately, the quality and enjoyment factor of the shows is what is important. My hope is to create theatre that people can't wait to see. That's easy to say, but it's harder to do."

Hunt said that he expected the theatre to continue to draw big-name stars.

Peter Hunt, shown here with WTF veteran Christopher Reeve, has been named director of the famous summer festival. (Gillooly)

"They'll still keep coming back. I knew a lot of these people personally. I work with a lot of them during the year. There's an awful lot of actors that audiences would like to see that would like to come. The problem is not the desire, but scheduling."

"I'm also not looking necessarily for stars, but for the best actor to play the part. It's important that our theatre bring in new talent," he said.

1990 LA&S GRADUATES: A Special Announcement concerning Careers in Business Specifically for Liberal Arts and Sciences Students.

The School of Accountancy of DePaul University, Chicago, Illinois, a 75-year leader in innovative accounting education, offers to selected graduates of prestigious Liberal Arts and Sciences programs the Professional Master of Science in Accountancy. The program is offered in conjunction with the nation's leading accounting firms, is highly competitive, and restricted to students sponsored by the participating accounting firms.

The 15-month program entails:

- immediate (June 1990) employment in the Chicago office of a sponsoring accounting firm.
- an accelerated course of study in business and accounting — a growth industry — at Chicago's DePaul University.

Successful completion of the DePaul Professional MSA program results in:

- A Master of Science in Accountancy degree from DePaul University
- Full-time business and accounting experience with a major accounting firm
- Eligibility to sit for the CPA Examination in Illinois
- Broad career opportunities, and advancement, in professional accounting with your sponsoring firm.

Participation is restricted to candidates sponsored by participating accounting firms.

The Professional MSA Program begins mid-June, 1990.

For more information on the Professional MSA Program, contact the placement office on this campus, which is cooperating with this program, or Dr. John T. Ahern, Jr., Director, School of Accountancy, DePaul University, 23 E. Jackson, Chicago, Illinois 60604, (312) 341-8770.

Orchestra gives entrancing performance

by Beth Neely

The Berkshire Symphony was back with a cleaned up act in their first concert Saturday night, playing works by Harbison, Elgar, and yes, a Beethoven symphony, in a packed Chapin Hall.

New director Ronald Feldman was able to unify the orchestra. The group played with a sensitivity both within and between sections, making the music really communicate in a balanced body of sound. Gone were the days of feuds flying every which way or sections struggling to keep together. Instead, the tight ensemble gave the group a new edge.

The centerpiece of the program was Elgar's Cello Concerto played by guest artist Andres Diaz. Due to its reflective and private nature, it is sometimes a difficult piece to enter into as a listener. However, this performance had an especially entrancing aspect. The soloist and orchestra dovetailed perfectly to create well-fitted yet expansive joints of sound.

At only 25, Diaz's poetic musicality and technical finesse sound like those of a veteran artist. His lyrical lines were the most satisfying. The flow never stopped, as if he had an endless bow and did not require bow changes. This was most apparent in the short Adagio movement before the finale. His great care in crafting sensitive lines, however, might have overshadowed a more gassy spontaneity called for by the dotted rhythms of the final Allegro.

Feldman and the orchestra provided a rock solid support. Feldman followed Diaz exactly, without seeming on top of him, and he led the orchestra as a cushion for the solo line. The two blended so well that the work often seemed less of a concerto and more of a tone poem with cello solos. The bassoons created wonderful pulsing undercurrents in the last movement.

The performance of Beethoven's Seventh put Beethoven back into Chapin Hall after a long absence. Feldman's reading focused on the balances between restraint and liberation in tempo and dynamics, and this made for an exciting, engaging performance.

A wonderful example of restraint was in the first movement's introduction, each section saved its sound without blurring it all out, and the oboe and flute floated effortlessly above the texture. The second movement was especially effective, from the pianissimo entrance of the cello to the tiny taints of color added in each section, finally liberated in the brilliance of full orchestral color.

However, the last movement was an example of liberation which went a bit too far. It raced by at a tempo which the players could not handle cleanly, and, especially in the strings, the articulation was lost. As a whole the work had a contagious rhythmic energy and joy, and anyone who might have felt somewhat immune to the musical message of the Elgar would have certainly been infected by this one.

The program opened with "Remembering Gatsby," a ten-minute offering by American composer John Harbison. The sweeping, somewhat dissonant opening dissolved into a rhythmic jazzy theme, a surprise after the preceding serious character.

The percussion was at its best, and the music recalled the good old days of the 1920s. This mood was interrupted by the opening material, perhaps representing reality setting in once again. It was an effective opening, and offered a change from the regular concert overture.

The next Berkshire Symphony concert will include "Nocturnes" by Debussy, as well as the world premiere of Professor of Music Robert Suderburg's Harp Concerto, played by Marilyn Costello of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

THE MOUNTAINS
Words and Music by Or. Washington Gladden, Williams Class of 1859

O proudly rise the monarchs of our mountain land
With their kingly forest robes to the sky
Where Alma Mater dwelleth with her chosen band,
And the peaceful river floweth gently by.

CHORUS:
The mountains! the mountains! we greet them with a song
Whose echoes, rebounding their woodland heights along,
Shall mingle with anthers that winds and fountains sing,
Till hill and valley gaily, gaily, ring.

The snows of winter crown them with a crystal crown,
And the silver clouds of Summer round them cling;
The Autumn's scarlet mantle flows in richest down,
And they revel in the garniture of Spring.

O, mightily they battle with a storm king's power;
And conquerors shall triumph here for aye
Yet quietly their shadows fall at evening hour,
While the gentle breezes round them softly play.

Beneath their peaceful shadows may old Williams stand
"Till sun and mountains never more shall be
The glory and the honor of our mountain land,
And the dwelling of the gallant and the free.

Daytona may close doors to spring break revelry

College Press Service
Spring break at Daytona Beach may meet the demise of spring break at other vacation spots like Miami Beach, Fort Lauderdale, Palm Springs, California and, most recently, Virginia Beach. Daytona Beach is one of the last places that still welcomes vacationing students.

However, officials in Daytona Beach, Florida, announced that 1990 may be the last year they will welcome students to vacation there during spring break.

Visitors bureau officials said that they will send a squad of representatives to a number of campuses in early 1990 to warn students to be on their best behavior when they head south this spring.

"We want students to party, but we want them to do it responsibly," Suzanne Smith, director of the city's spring break task force, said. The task force is still undecided on how many campuses will be visited.

Smith said Daytona Beach will discourage students from drinking there during spring break if students do not behave more responsibly.

Since 1984 seven people have died and 34 have been injured in falls from Daytona hotel and motel balconies. Last spring the city was largely unable to control the 400,000 students who visited, Smith said.

Students trashed hotels, urinated on lawns, passed out in driveways and disturbed residents with blaring radios. The community is no longer willing to put up with that, Smith said, even though visitors spent an estimated $120 million in the area.

"The message we're taking to campuses," she said, "is that we want students to come to Daytona." When they get there, however, they will find stricter rules to regulate drinking and a variety of nonstop activities to keep students busy.

"The problems arise when kids just sit around and drink."

Tutorial program receives $600K grant

by Tom Dupree

Fearful by some, loved by others, the tutorial is here to stay -- at least for the next four years. The Sherman Fairchild Foundation recently awarded Williams a grant of $604,000 to support the college's tutorial program through 1993.

The tutorial program is now in its second full year. Students taking tutorials meet in discussion groups of two with a professor once a week. Its unique format poses a financial problem which the grant will help meet.

According to Dean of the Faculty John Reichert, the low student-teacher ratio in tutorials causes this problem. "The expense is that a faculty member who teaches a tutorial is inevitably teaching a course with ten people and maybe giving up a course with seventy," he said. "It's a cost. Tutorials are an expensive means of teaching."

Reichert said that the tutorial format met with almost unanimous student and faculty enthusiasm during its debut last year and should continue to provide a popular alternative to the traditional classroom structure.

"[The grant] ensures that if student and faculty interest grows, and I expect it to, we would receive good [financial] support over the next four years, enabling us to expand the program," he said. "I would regard this as a very generous grant that will support the development of a pool of experienced tutorial teachers. It's seed money, but it's a lot of seed money."

'Even before the grant was approved, departments were looking to expand the number of tutorials they offered.'

The money from the grant will be paid gradually over the next four years.

Johnson announced that twelve one-month stipends of $4000 each will be made available for the planning and organization of new tutorials during the summer of 1990. If approved, these courses could debut in the following fall or spring semester.

More tutorials may result
Johnson stated that his long-range goal is to offer more tutorials in a variety of disciplines. "We'd like to improve the diversity, build a repertoire. We don't want to stay static. Even before the grant was approved, departments were looking to expand the number of tutorials they offered," he said.

"The grant will sustain and expand upon the college's original investment. The money comes at a critical time for us. It will certainly prove very helpful," Johnson joined Reichert in praising the program. "The tutorial is the ultimate bargain," he said. "It's like dying and going to heaven."

it is underway all over the place." Yet the areas have definitely not recovered. "Everything is about the quake. It's not going to go away."

The tectonic plates, whose movement causes earthquakes, have not settled yet. "There are still aftershocks. They still measure 5 [on the Richter scale], which is really quite big. It's a strange feeling when the ground won't stop moving," she said.

Economic effect

"No one can measure how the economic costs will be distributed," she explained. "What will happen to a middle class family shouldering a huge mortgage with a destroyed house and no mortgage insurance. Now, inflated real estate prices are attached to piles of rubble."

Brown said that although San Francisco and the East Bay (Oakland and Berkeley) have received the most attention in the news and are slated to receive most of the federal and state aid, she is very concerned about the economic impact of the quake.

Brown said, however, that she has a renewed faith in mankind. "We hear so much about individualism and self centredness. I've been really struck by how splendid people have been. I've seen tremendous amounts of concern for others," she said. "Nobody talks about leaving California. The response is not, 'Oh, I can't stand this. I'm leaving.' Around Santa Cruz, I've noticed a love for the place and the community and a tremendous desire to rebuild."

Women's soccer beats Vassar, Holyoke; falls to Connecticut

by Kevin Greenberg

Every March fans of college basketball watch CBS's broadcast of the tournament selection committee. If a team is selected the fans are ecstatic, if not, the team hopes to hear from "the other tournament," the NIT.

For New England women's soccer the analogue of the NCAA tournament is the NESCAC while the NEAC bracket is "the other tournament."

At press time, the Williams team was waiting to hear from either tournament after they won two of three crucial games last week to finish the regular season with a 8-6 record.

"I think we have a pretty good chance of getting into NEACs, but I don't think we have much of a chance to go to NESCAC," said Coach Lisa Melendy. The Ephs were not ranked in the top 10 entering the week, but 12 teams will probably advance and Williams scored a big victory over sixth-ranked Mount Holyoke College last Tuesday.

Strikers Liz Nasser '92 and Sharon Glick '93 scored less than six minutes apart in the first half to put the Ephs up 2-0. Nasser scored on a rebound off of the goalkeeper while Glick's goal was on a pass from midfielder Melissa Thaxton '93.

Halfback Lynne Brenner '90 then put the game out of reach with a goal with 20 minutes remaining in the game. Brenner charged the net and knocked in a pass from striker Audra Maztzer '91.

The squad's momentum was stopped when they ran into Connecticut College on Thursday. The Camels, who Melendy said were the best team the Ephs played this season, scored two goals early in the second half. Connecticut scored once after a corner kick and then tallied again 7:16 later when they scored on what goalkeeper Sara Treworgy '93 termed "a nice overhead shot." Williams was only able to get one goal back when captain Jeanette Owen '90 drove the ball over the goal line into the net from 40 yards out with 4:56 left in the game. It was the first collegiate goal for the senior fullback.

The loss forced the Ephs to win their last game Saturday to salvage an above-.500 season. Williams is a superior team than Vassar and won despite what the coach considered a sub-par performance.

"It was a pretty low level game," said the coach of the 2-1 victory. "They are not a very strong team and we got sucked into playing their game."

The Ephs scored on goals by Glick and Brenner. Brenner scored off a low crossing pass from Nasser. Brenner crashed toward the goal and scored with 23 minutes remaining in the first half.

Glick then extended the Williams lead as she beat a defender to score.

"She went by her around the 18 [yard penalty box]. It was a good shot that passed the keeper at the far post," said Melendy.

Vassar only tallied once, six minutes after halftime, before time expired in the game and the regular season.

The increased offense in recent games is due in large part to the three-forward offense that the squad implemented last week. The team used three women up front all week and, according to the coach, will possibly use it in the tournament. If the selection committee lets them.

Soviets to destroy Baltic-based nuclear subs

Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev, in Finland, announced that the U.S.S.R. would destroy four Baltic-based Gulf-class nuclear submarines by the end of 1990. This pledge is part of a joint declaration on principles signed by Gorbachev and Finland's President Mauno Koivisto, which also involved the denunciation of the use of force on allies — especially Eastern European, Soviet-bloc nations — or neutral countries — such as Finland — in the region. The agreement also involved environmental and trade cooperation in the Kola Peninsula and the Soviet's official recognition of Finland as a neutral country. Also of significance is Gorbachev's statement on the reduction of short-range tactical weapons in Northern Europe not covered in the treaty with the United States. However, while Gorbachev continues his campaign for disarmament in Finland, United States intelligence reports showed an escalation of the long-awaited Soviet anti-missile defense system.

Death toll on freeway reduced

After rescue and construction workers helped to clear debris from the ruins of a mile-long stretch of Interstate 880, the estimated death toll from the collapse of that highway was reduced from 250 to 39. In all, experts believe that fewer than 50 died in the sixth deadliest earthquake in the nation's history. Meanwhile, the use of the Bay Area Rapid Transit subway system has increased by 48 percent to 300,000 passengers and the U.S. House has approved $2.85 billion in emergency aid for Northern California. Jim Roberts, the structural division chief of the state transportation department, said it would take four weeks to demolish and reconstruct a temporary freeway.

Reagan's documents can be used in Iran-Contra trial

A federal judge ruled that the official notes and diaries of former President Ronald Reagan, but not President George Bush, must be handed over for one of the Iran-Contra trials if those papers do exist. The judge said that he was convinced by the evidence presented that "notes were taken by the president [Reagan] and others" should be available for the trial of former national security adviser John Poindexter, who faces five charges. Judge Harold Greene said that there was no proof that Bush, vice president at the time of the scandal had no authority over Poindexter at that time and so Bush's notes would not be subpoenaed. Justice Department spokesman David Runkel said that Greene's order for Reagan's documents raises serious questions about "forced disclosure of presidential documents." Reagan's private lawyer, Theodore Olson, has not commented.

Bakker and Gabor off to the slammer

Former PTL (Praise the Lord) ministry televangelist Jim Bakker received a sentence of 45 years in prison and was ordered to pay $500,000 in fines on 24 counts of fraud and conspiracy. The charges stem from an estimated $158 million in illicit fundraising for his Heritage USA Christian theme park. He will be eligible for parole in 10 years. His wife, Tammy Faye, was not present at the sentencing, but his daughter, Tammy Sue Chapman, was led out of the courtroom in tears. Bakker will complete his sentence in the Federal Correctional Facility at Talladega, Ala. Judge Robert Potter, who has acquired the name "Maximum Bob," authored a strong statement in his sentencing as he referred to Bakker and his colleagues as "money-grubbing preachers and priests." Also, actress Zsa Zsa Gabor was sentenced to three days in jail, a fine of $12,937, 120 hours in community service, and a psychiatric evaluation after her conviction for battery of a police officer, driving without a license, and possessing an open container of alcohol. Beverly Hills Municipal Judge Charles Rubin expressed his anger with Gabor's exploitation of the trial for publicity and for "unfairly attacking" the arresting officer by accusing him of having several gay lovers. Gabor has 30 days after the tense trial to appeal but her lawyer has made no comments.

WWRFC ends scoring drought, crushes Brits

by Kristin Moomaw

The WWRFC ended their long scoring drought on Saturday as they took on the Keene State Brits at home. The Big Red from New Hampshire arrived at the pitch four players short of a full side. Seniors Gina Coleman, Briar McNutt, and co-captains Kathie Lapey and Wendy Lipp offered to scab. These traitors proved to be a welcome addition to the Brits' offense.

Any "the" Sack '92 opened the game with a beautiful kick-off that put the White Dogs deep in their offensive territory. Traitor Wendy Lipp '90 ran the ball well for Keene State to get her new team out of danger. It looked as though the Brits were going to score, but Sack dove under the ball to defend her try-zone. Outstanding play by scrumhalf Andrea Walter '92 dominated the game. Walter repeatedly baffled the Brits with her tricky penalty calls and tough defense. Coleman gained a lot of yardage for the Brits as she donned her Halloween "try face" Lapey, in her fullback debut, also helped the scab team with great kicks. McNutt balanced out these two players with great defense on sophomore stand-out Andrea Walter.

Freshman Margaret "silver bullet" Wang made a spectacular run after catching one of Lapey's kicks. She sprinted past the confused Brits for almost 25 yards. This put the White Dogs in an excellent position to capitalize on the red penalty a few minutes later. Sophomore Colleen

Fired up by their halftime lead, the WWRFC was ready to play their best half of the season. Great tackles by Walter and by Janet "grunt" Baker combined with a strong scrum push by "Scary" Mary Mihalopolous '93 and Christy Johnson '92 brought the Brit offense to a standstill. Kristen van Scorn '93 broke through every linout. Van Scorn ran the ball extremely well with support from Timmie "velcro hands" Friend '90. The white line burst into the ball to move it quickly down the line. Baker caught the ball and sprinted 20 meters, dodging tackles, to score the opening try for the WWRFC.

Eunhak Bae '93 added to the offensive punch with good runs and quick passes. Stephanie "Blistex" Walker '92 stripped well to keep the mauls short. Freshman Alison Schapler showed great desire in rucks and mauls. As the game drew to a close, Nickie Bouvier '92 proved that the game is not over until the last whistle blows as she relentlessly battled past the Big Red. Bouvier and van Scorn were on the verge of scoring a try when the play was called due to the players' dangerous proximity to the upright posts. In the ensuing scrumdown the Brits drew a penalty which proved to be costly. Walter's outstanding play culminated in a suicide run where she pushed the ball over the try-line. Sack kicked the conversion as the final game whistle blew, leaving the White Dogs with a 13-0 win.

the season with an assist from freshman Tsholwane Mokoena, making the score 3-0.

Sophomore goalkeeper Chuck Goldfarb raised his record to 6-0 on the season, making two saves to pick up his third shutout. The Ephmen outshot the Camels 24-6 on the day, controlling the flow of the game from start to finish. The victory avenged a 2-1 loss to Connecticut last season, which was the only flaw in that team's 17-1 record.

"We played with confidence," Coach Mike Russo said. "We didn't finish our plays in the first half but came out in the second half and played with enthusiasm. It was a total team contribution; the entire bench played well."

On the down side for Williams, midfielder Peter Lyn '91 suffered a shoulder injury early in the second half and did not play for the rest of the game.

OT win over Tufts

The Ephs were forced into overtime against Tufts on Saturday, October 21, but exploded for three goals in the extra thirty minutes of play, resulting in a 5-2 victory. The game was marked by another Williams injury just a few minutes into the action. Orjan Hult '92 went up for a loose ball in the goalmouth and banged heads with a Tufts defender. Hult was knocked unconscious and soon went into an uncontrollable seizure, his body shaking wildly on the ground. He was taken to a hospital, and tests indicate that he suffered no serious injury. The sophomore should be back in action in the upcoming week.

The Ephs held the lead on two separate occasions in regulation, but both times the Jumbos came back and tied the score. Brooks scored from the crease early in the first half after a direct kick off the foot of captain Dan Calichman '90. Early in the second half, with the score tied at 1-1, Bailey took a pass from Lyn and sent the ball into the upper left corner of the net. Tufts tied the score again with 20 minutes left in regulation, as the Williams defense was caught out of position on the play.

"Orjan's injury really shook the team up," Lyn said. "We made a lot of mental mistakes as a result and didn't get into the game until late." The team was certainly at the peak of its concentration in overtime, though, as the Ephs controlled the extra thirty minutes and netted three goals.

Lyn scored the decisive goal for Williams, his first of the season, lining a crossing pass from Lake perfectly and scoring from the goalmouth. Lake scored with under 10 minutes to play with an assist from Brooks, and McIlvain scored another insurance goal in the final minutes with an assist from Bailey.

The Ephs outshot the Jumbos 19-4 in front of goalkeeper Bill Henning '93, who picked up his third win on the season.

Sandwiched between these two victories was a midweek road loss to Babson. This was the third defeat for Williams on the season, and it was the third time that the Ephs were shut out 1-0 on the road.

The Ephmen outshot the Beavers 15-4 on the day, but were stifled by the ten saves of Babson goalkeeper Steve Webber and a tight Babson defense. The Ephs had the better of the play but could not capitalize on any of their scoring chances.

Babson played a very cautious game. Their defense was tight and didn't allow us any good opportunities in close. We did get a lot of shots on net, but some of them were right at the keeper, and our goalie also made some great saves," Coach Russo commented.

Upcoming action

The Ephs will travel to Middletown to face Wesleyan this coming Saturday, and they also open the ECAC Division III tournament against Bridgewater State College (12-4-1) on Thursday at 2:30 at Cnle Field. Williams was seeded first in New England in the tournament, and the Ephs will be defending the title which they have won for the past two seasons.

IM Soccer Report

The IM soccer playoffs kicked off last week, and talk focused around an incredibly muddy field, a strange set of penalties, and a hot Light Blue team. Only two of the top five regular-season squads made the semis, as Light Green received two byes and White, undisciplined in their last nine contests, posted hard-fought 1-0 victories over Dark Green and Purple, which had earlier sent Navy Blue packing with a 3-1 win.

Meanwhile, Light Blue overcame the mud and grime of a scarred Piker Flats pitch to down Royal Blue 2-0 and, two days later, Red 3-1 in a game that lasted more than an hour and a half. Light Blue, winners of their last seven, will face Maroon, which beat Gold 3-2 in a classic overtime match, and a decimated Grey squad 2-0, in the semis on Monday. The final will be played today at 4 p.m. behind the tennis courts.

Field hockey vanquishes Westfield, Conn. College, enters post-season

by Birgit Huppach

The Williams field hockey team built on its previous successes last week, defeating Connecticut College 2-1 and Westfield 1-0. The Ephs have now been ranked third in New England for three consecutive weeks.

Williams took an early lead in its home game last Tuesday against Connecticut College. Amy Kershaw '90 scored four minutes into the game from a pass by Ann Marie Marvin '91. Two minutes later, however, Connecticut came back and scored, leaving the score at 1-1 for the first half.

The Ephwomen kept struggling for the lead, but the game stood still until 29:45 into the second half, when Laurie Burnett '91 scored the winning goal. Burnett was assisted by Kershaw and co-captain Beth McNulty '90. Williams outshot Connecticut 20-4.

Last Saturday the team travelled to Westfield and proved itself capable of a win even on enemy turf. Again, the Ephs took an early lead: two minutes into the first half, Kershaw scored the only goal of the game off an assist by co-captain Maureen Flaherty '90. Williams outshot its opponent 17-8 and had nine penalty corners against Westfield's seven. Stacy Minyard '90 served as goalie for the game.

The Ephs are now hoping to be ranked in the top four of the eight teams participating in the New England ECAC's. With their regular season over, they can now focus their attention on playoffs.

Professional Services Careers for Liberal Arts Graduates

WHERE LIBERAL ARTS GRADUATES CAN BECOME PRICE WATERHOUSE PROFESSIONALS

AND EARN AN ADVANCED DEGREE IN BUSINESS AT NEW YORK UNIVERSITY

There are many reasons why the Big Apple is considered to be the best place to launch a business career. Take, for example, the Price Waterhouse/New York University business program for liberal arts graduates.

It is a challenging and competitive 15 months to be sure. But it is time well spent. You'll spend your days working on the professional staff of the New York office of Price Waterhouse. And some nights and two summers attending the New York University Graduate School of Business Administration, where you can obtain an MS in accounting. Then, if you like, you can continue on for your MBA.

Even while attending NYU full-time, you will remain on full salary at PW. When you complete the program, you will have earned an advanced degree from one of the country's top business schools. You will also have gained invaluable practical experience working for one of the leading business advisory firms in the world. Experience which includes interacting with client executives on important business problems.

If you think you might be interested in the upcoming program, you should plan on taking your GMATs no later than March of 1990.

And to learn more about this truly unique career and educational opportunity, and to meet some of the participants currently in the program, plan on attending the upcoming Price Waterhouse information session:

Eph football completely dominates the Middlebury Panthers in a 22-0 shutout

by Kerr Houston

A long time from now, some members of the 1989 Williams football team might get out their scrapbooks, and slowly turning the yellowing pages, come upon a story or photo of Saturday's 22-0 victory over the Middlebury Panthers. "And that," the players might tell their friends, "was how good we were."

Saturday's whitewashing was the kind of game that serves as a summary of a team's entire season, as both the offense, with back Neal Chesley '90 pitching in 162 yards, and the defense, which held the Panthers (1-4-1) to five first downs and 125 total yards, completely dominated their opponents. In the process, the Ephs extended a school-record winning streak to 11 games and took another step towards the first B+ season in the school's 109-year football history.

A war of attrition?
The contest, however, remained a close one for most of the first half, as both coaches adhered to extremely conservative game plans. Middlebury quarterback Pat Dwyer, playing despite a chipped bone in his throwing hand, did not throw a pass in the entire half, and his Williams counterpart Chris Hevey '91, making his first start in place of injured Dan Dwyer '92, tossed the pigskin only four times.

For the most part, however, the two teams found themselves unable to get the offensive gears turning, and the game opened with three ineffective drives. Finally, on the strength of solid runs by Chesley and Larry Iken '90, the Ephs took a 7-0 lead on a three-yard drive. The Panthers stormed through the Williams line to block sophomore kicker Brian Taplick's point after attempt, but soon found themselves down eight as Paul Reidy '92 scooped up the loose ball and trotted into the end zone for a rather moribund two-point conversion.

The vaunted Eph defense then took center stage, yielding just one Panther first down and a mere 31 yards in the second quarter, with captain Brian Stevens '89 turning in two sacks. However, Hevey found himself unable to lead his troops to paydirt again, as penalties offset more solid running by Chesley and a long pass to tight end Lindsey Vaughan '92. At one point, the Ephs found themselves with a first down at the Panther 25, but a muffed snap and solid Middlebury pass pressure served as sand in the Williams offensive engine.

In the third stanza the Panthers, who had not gotten past midfield in the first half, mounted a mild threat, advancing the Williams 41, but Stevens brought his first down on that drive, stopping Middlebury halfback Mike Toomey for no gain on fourth-and-short. Just four plays later, Chesley sealed his third straight 100-yard game with a 53-yard touchdown sprint that lifted the Ephs to a 15-0 advantage with 4:17 left in the third quarter.

Minutes later, the Ephs marched 62 yards on ten plays, eventually scoring on senior John Perryman's one-yard plunge that came early in the fourth quarter. Taplick's kick gave Williams a 22-point lead and had the quiet Middlebury bench wondering who was up next on their schedule.

The Eph defense held tight the rest of the way as Mike Hyde '91 picked off his team's leading fifth pass of the year and Dave Bakken '90 also hauled in a Panther toss to stamp out any Middlebury threat and to lead Williams, which posted four straight shutouts last year, to its first whitewashing of the year.

With six wins this in their back pocket, the next page in the Eph scrapbook will involve a tussle at Little Three rival Wesleyan, a squad which has taken its knocks this year. On the horizon, of course, looms 4-2 Amherst, which may well represent the final obstacle between the Ephs and an 8-0 season. These, however, are pages that have yet to be filled.

crew, according to Coach Cruz, but in the end they simply did not have the finesse to keep up with their competition.

The last Williams boat to race was the Championship eight, coxswained by Megan Ouchterloney '90, who is one of the co-captains of the Varsity eight, and stroked by Cara McCandless '90. The Williams championship boat placed nineteenth out of twenty-five boats. The race was won by the Boston Rowing Club, a powerful rowing organization.

Of the competing boats however, the only Dad Vail boat to place ahead of Williams was Navy, which came in sixteenth. Williams did place ahead of Smith College (21), University of Massachusetts (20), Connecticut College (23), Trinity (24), and Tufts (25). The schools which dominated the race were the Ivy League, with Cornell coming in third. Most of the Ephwomen said that they found the race both exciting and encouraging. Despite the overall standings amongst the Dad Vail teams Williams did extremely well. The goal that the Williams women have set for themselves is to be one of the top Dad Vail schools by the end of the spring season. They seem to be in sight of their goal.

Although the Williams women's novice team did not compete at the Head of the Charles (with the exception of the four novice rowers who rowed in the Youth eight), they did compete in a race last Sunday against the University of Vermont in a series of scrimmages attended by families visiting for Freshmen Parents' Weekend. Both the novice boats ended their season on a strong note, beating UVM in all four of the scrimmages.

SPORTS

Volleyball has last laugh, beats Albany

by Rhonda Goodman

The women's volleyball team knew they had to beat Division II team Albany to push their record to 22-2. They also wanted to keep alive their chances for selection into the East Coast Athletic Conference Championships. They did just that, beating Albany, 16-14, 10-15, 15-5, 8-15, 15-11.

The Ephs did not win this match easily, as they spent last Tuesday evening coming from behind and stopping Albany comebackers. Holly Hedeman '92 said this was one day where the team was slow starting.

"We had a hard time in the beginning of all of the games," she said. "We would get behind real quick. Then, we'd get mad and say it's time to rally."

The squad had to extinguish an Albany comeback in the first game, as Williams blew a 9-1 lead and allowed Albany to tie the game at 10-10. Spikes by Elizabeth Johnson '93 and Kathy McConnell '91 broke a 14-14 tie, held their opponents back and gave the Ephs the opener, 16-14.

A mirror image?
The second game was the complete opposite of the first, as Albany blew a 2-13 lead, and the Ephwomen attempted a comeback of their own. Laurie Hartsoe '91 had two aces and a service winner that helped the team shave Albany's lead. McConnell had two dinks and Johnson and Shelley Whelpton '90 had one kill each, but Albany held the Ephs to 10 points and won the second stanza 15-10.

After Albany's win, the Albany bench began warming up, as though they were going to come into the game. Hartsoe said she didn't notice the bench warming up, but she did notice Albany's lax attitude toward the Ephs.

"They were laughing at us right in our faces. The people weren't concentrating," she said. "They were treating us like a second-class team."

The Williams six, though, had the final laugh in this game, as they controlled the third set. The 5-5 tie was as close as the game got. After four Hartsoe kills and two kills each from Hedeman and McConnell contributed to the team's win, 15-5.

The fourth game stayed tight until the score was tied at 8-8, at which point Albany vaulted past a stumbling Williams squad to post seven straight points. Hedeman missed her first kill of the entire match, then proceeded to miss four more. Hedeman said her concentration slipped in the game.

"I wasn't concentrating as well," she said. "The sets were shorter than I'm used to."

Hartsoe said she never felt the team lost any concentration at any time during the match, even when the team was losing. "Momentum swings had a big effect on the game," she said. "We knew we had a good chance of beating them. Overall, I think our intensity was definitely into it."

The Eph's momentum swing picked up in the deciding game against Albany. The team was down 1-7 when the pace began to pick up again. Their opponents begin hitting several spikes out-of-bounds. When the score was 10-11, a Hedeman kill gave the Ephs the sidout. They held Albany to 11 points and won the match, 15-11.

The team had last week off from practice, but resumed practice yesterday and eagerly look forward to finding out if they've been selected for the ECAC Championships, which will be held on November 11.

Ephwomen Shelley Whelpton '90 and Kathy McConnell '91 block an attempted Albany spike during last Tuesday's match. Williams upped their record to 22-2 in the win over Albany. (Jenkins)

Athletes of the Week

This week's recipients are a pair of Williams athletes who turned in outstanding running performances on Saturday to carry their teams to victory. Neal Chesley '90 tore up a Middlebury defense during Saturday's 22-0 football triumph over the Panthers, as he ran for 162 yards. Chesley's performance followed on the heels of a 176-yard day against Colby and gave the halfback three consecutive 100-yard games. Marc Beitz '91, meanwhile, roared his way to first place in Saturday's Little Three cross-country meet, posting an impressive 25:03 mark for the 4.9-mile course and thereby leading the Ephmen to their 18th Little Three title in 20 years. Congrats to Neal and Marc, this week's Athletes of the Week! Not pictured above: Marc Beitz.

Sports Quiz

- 1) Has the Williams football team ever turned in an 8-0 season?
- 2) When did the last World Series sweep occur?
- 3) Who sent Boris Becker to a second-round defeat in the Wimbledon play?
- 4) For which Italian soccer club does Argentinian star Diego Maradona suit up?

Congrats to Josh Brumberg '92, who turned in last week's winning entry! Last week's answers: Williams last played ten football games without a loss in 1973-4 (including a 3-3 tie); A.C. Milan, Sampdoria, and Juventus are Italian soccer clubs; Wayne Gretzky broke the NHL scoring record against his old squad, the Edmonton Oilers; Jimmy Carson indicated that he would not play for the Edmonton Oilers. Send your answers to Marian Naficy at SU 1871 by Saturday. In case of a tie, the winner will be chosen in a random drawing.

Crewmen solid at Head of Charles

by Eric Chiu

The men's crew team packed up last weekend for the last regatta of the fall season. The Head of the Charles race, that took place on October 22nd in Boston, was a major event that attracted crew teams from all around the world.

Notable among the crew teams from abroad were two teams from England. One of the teams was from Nottingham County, while the other team, composed of retired semi-professional rowers from the English national team, was named the Tideway Scullers.

The Williams team did well at the race, according to captain Michael Mader '90. "It was a solid race. We showed a lot of promise," said Mader.

The Ephmen entered a boat in each of the three categories: championship, club, and youth. The A-boat, which was in the championship race, placed nineteenth out of thirty boats.

"We were 11 seconds behind Temple [the first place finisher] and only 4 seconds behind the Coast Guard Academy... Our biggest rivals are teams like Trinity, Wesleyan, and Coast Guard. Wesleyan didn't have a boat in our event [championship] and Trinity finished 40 seconds behind us. Our biggest goal now is to try to catch up to Temple in the spring season," said Mader.

"The boat was moving very well. We did better than some of the other boats like the Coast Guard. However, we have a lot of work to do this winter," Tom Wideman '92 commented on the team's performance.

Kate Iverson '90, who was the coxswain for the varsity A-boat, agreed with this analysis. "It did better than last season. We were pretty comparable to the other teams that were there."

She added, "[The race] gave us a feeling of how much work we needed for the spring. It was a barometer of the progress we have made."

In the club event, the Ephmen finished twenty-fifth out of a total of forty boats. Dwight Eyrich '90 commented,

"The race went very smoothly. We did well though we put the boat [crew] together at the last minute... What was really interesting is that the novice coach, Hans Fleigh, rowed with us."

To qualify for the next year's race, the Ephs had to finish within five percent of the winning time. However, the first place finisher in the club event, the Tideway Scullers, completed the race with the time of 16 minutes and 25 seconds, ahead of Williams' 17 minutes and 36 seconds.

The third Williams boat, composed of three freshmen and five sophomores, competed in the youth event. The Ephs finished well despite the inexperience of the team members. Arun Pullani '92 remarked, "we finished about twenty-fifth out of about thirty-two boats. It was a pretty rough race. It was the first time that many of the rowers [in the third boat] were in the Head of the Charles."

The Head of the Charles was the last race of the fall season for the team, who will begin racing again in the spring.

Men's soccer suffers first Div. III loss

by Jeff Merritt

It's crunch time for the Williams men's soccer team. Only the ECAC tournament and matches against Little Three rivals Wesleyan and Amherst remain in the team's season. The Eph record stands at an impressive 9-3 after the past week, but the squad will have to play its best in the upcoming weeks if it hopes to add any more marks in the win column.

The past week saw the Ephmen defeat both the Connecticut College Camels and the Tufts Jumbos at Cole Field by respective 3-0 and 5-2 margins. The Ephs also suffered their first Division III loss of the season, though, in a 1-0 heartbreaker on the road against the Babson Beavers.

Support from the sidelines

"Playing in front of a large home crowd is the best feeling," junior Rob Lake said after the victory over Connecticut last Saturday. The Williams faithful filled the bleachers and lined the sides of the field, and the Ephs responded to this support with a fine offensive effort.

The first half was scoreless, as the Ephmen failed to convert any of their numerous scoring chances. Ambi Stern '90 and Laurin Laderoute '92 had the best opportunities in the half. Stern drilled a shot off the post after a Steve Bailey '91 corner kick with 13:55 elapsed. Midway through the half, Laderoute put a shot just over the net after a scramble in the penalty area. With five minutes left in the first stanza, he also sent a header slightly wider after a crossing pass from Doug Brooks '90.

Midfielder Sam McIlvain '90 goes up for a header during last Saturday's home game against Connecticut College. Parents and friends were on hand to watch the Ephs cruise to a 3-0 victory, in which McIlvain registered an assist. (Thomas)

Were you late getting back to your seat for the start of the second half? If so, you missed the first two Williams goals, which both came before three minutes had elapsed. Stern scored his second goal of the season on a header from the goalmouth, while Lake was credited with an assist on the play. Before the cheering had died down, Lake made the score 2-0, taking a pass from Sam McIlvain '90 and beating the Connecticut goalkeeper.

Men, women capture Little Three cross-country titles

by Heather Smith

The Williams women's and men's cross-country teams each captured the 1989 Little Three title Saturday at Wesleyan University, as neither the Amherst nor the Wesleyan squads could hold a candle to the powerful Williams teams. Claiming all five of the top scoring slots, the women won their meet with a perfect score of 15 points. In a similar showing, the men won their race with 20 points. The men's score was the lowest winning score at a Little Three Championship since 1975 (in cross-country scoring, the team with the lowest score wins).

The conditions for Saturday's meet were atypical of a late season cross-country meet. The unseasonably warm temperature and the flat, paved course made the Little Three race look more like a late summer road race than a late fall cross-country meet. That didn't seem to bother the Williams' competitors, however, as they quickly posted and maintained wide leads over their opponents.

Of the 37 competitors in the women's race, 23 wore Williams purple. Williams' placed eight runners in the top 10 and 16 runners in the top 20 places. In fact, the domination of the Williams team was so complete that even if Williams had run only the freshman women, the team would still have tallied a winning score.

A swarm of purple

Despite a week of tough workouts, many of the Williams women showed marked drops in their times. Williams' first scorer, Molly Martin '92, won the 3.1 mile women's race in 18:07. Williams' other four scorers followed in immediate succession, as Anne Platt '91 claimed second place in 18:22 and Ann Dannhauer '90 raced to third place in 18:34. Lindsey Hall '93 and Helene Wilburn '93 completed the course in fourth and fifth place, respectively. Only after the first swarm of purple had crossed the finish line did another team's competitor finish. Amherst and Wesleyan runners looked like oddities, occasionally squeezed in between Williams runners who took place after place of the top slots.

The men's team also displayed a solid team victory Saturday as, for the 18th time in the last 20 years, Williams walked away with the Little Three title. Like the women, the men dominated in pure depth as well as in strength. The Williams 21-man squad made up half of the 42 competitor field.

Brian Coan '92 said, "[Marc Beitz '91] controlled the race the whole way." Although Wesleyan's Ulandt Kim tried without avail to oust Beitz from the lead position, Beitz set an even pace ahead of Kim and then opened up at the four-mile mark, eventually racing to first place in 25:03. Beitz was not alone at the front, however. With seven runners in the top 10, Williams runners had the advantage of support from nearby teammates.

Coan, who has not taken a day off from training in the last 300 days, covered the 4.9-mile course in 25:29. Twenty seconds behind Coan, captain Dale Johnson '90 placed fourth. Williams' fourth scorer, Nate McVey-Finney '90, crossed the line next in 25:57, and Tony Werner '93 wrapped up Williams' winning score with a seventh-place finish in 26:20.

With the New England Championships only two weeks away, the cross-country teams will now begin to taper their training in hopes of tuning in optimal performances and peaking on November 11 for New England's Next week both teams will send squads to Colby College for the Division III Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference (ECAC).

Women's crew ends season with a strong showing at Head of Charles

by Asli Bali

On the evening of October 20, college students from all around the country began preparations for the greatest collegiate party of the year -- the Head of the Charles Regatta, held in Boston. Not everyone was there to party, however.

The Williams women's crew team spent the entire season in preparation for the Head of the Charles. Parties may have detracted attention from the races, but for the Williams women there was no doubt about why they had come: they were in Boston to compete.

The team arrived in Boston Friday night, and was up early Saturday morning for practice. They spent Saturday afternoon resting while the rest of Boston prepared for the evening's festivities. The Ephwomen were oblivious to all the activity around them on Saturday, and put in a good night's sleep.

The next day, October 22nd, turned out to be a cold and windy day; weather worsened the already difficult racing conditions. The Charles River course is winding and proves difficult steering. The conditions made it difficult for the team to get really excited despite the prestige of being in the race. However, as Coach Chris Cruz commented, "We don't go there to win, we go to be a part of rowing's most fantastic race, and nothing can take away from that!"

Williams competed against the top crew teams in the nation, including not only Dad Vail Regatta teams, but also Ivy League teams, independent rowing clubs, and crews from the West coast, Canada and even England.

They faced the toughest lightweight programs in the country and Canada

The Ephwomen went up with three boats: one Youth eight (a boat with rowers nineteen and under), one Lightweight eight, and the Championship eight. The first to row on Sunday morning was the Youth-eight. Bethany Moreton '92 served as coxswain, while Kris Davenport '92 was the stroke (rower who faces the cox, and sets the pace for the boat).

Youth eight place well

The Youth-eight rowed hard and seemed to fulfill the potential they had shown throughout the season's practices. The power of their enthusiasm drove them ahead of Worcester Polytechnical Institute halfway through the race and they finished tenth out of twenty three boats. Moreton coxed well, cutting corners to steer as straight a course as possible, saving the boat a great deal of time. The Youth-eight came away with the best standing achieved by the three Williams boats which competed at the Head of the Charles.

The Lightweight-eight was the second Williams women's boat to compete. They faced the toughest lightweight programs in the country and Canada. There were not many schools competing; the competition was mainly from the rowing clubs that attended. The Williams boat was coxswained by Sarah Fulkerson '90 and stroked by Jane Greenawalt '90.

The race was won by St. Catherine's Rowing Club of Canada, the largest rowing establishment in Canada. The Williams boat came in thirteenth out of sixteen boats. Greenawalt stroked a good race, and the team worked hard together throughout. It was a rough but scrappy

Bruised WRFC prevails over brutal Springfield

by Chris Blackburn

Although it's the time of year that snow is expected in the Purple Valley, the WRFC could not say no to the freakish good weather that the Williams community has enjoyed all week. The club was divided on this balmy Saturday, with the A and B sides travelling to sunny Springfield and the C's and D's playing for the Commissioner's Cup against North Adams State. The results, too, were mixed, as the upper sides came home bruised but victorious while the team future found itself on the losing end.

The A-side match, a 16-10 victory, was a classic confrontation of skill and good rugby against unmitigated brutality. The Springfield Club, in their all-black uniforms, seemed easily twice the size of the Williams side, and soon proved themselves twice the 'tants' as well. Hard-hitting both on and off the ball, they were unafraid to employ every dirty tactic known in an effort to intimidate the A-side, and for a while this and their good tackling and dominant scrum play snuffed the White Dogs. For much of the early going, the match was quite uninspired, as Black's hard hits stuffed the White line, and a lack of any shred of tactical knowledge kept Springfield from advancing the ball.

Knowledge will out?

Finally, the inevitable occurred. A brilliantly timed burst into the line by Phil "love or confusion" Jack '90 left two Springfield backs tackling each other. Jack proceeded to ramble forty meters before taking out the fullback and dispatching a perfect ball to the trailing Chap "take the handprint off my forehead" Peterson '90 for a gorgeous try that, with the conversion, put Williams ahead 6-0.

The potent Springfield scrum pressed the issue, however, and late in the first half they scored a try after a series of rolling mauls that the Williams forwards were unable to contain. The superior Williams line pushed back, however, and a Pete Stewart '90 try put the A-side up, 12-6, at the half.

A low point for the A's occurred in the second half when the Springfield pack drove in a 5-meter scrum for a try, despite valiant effort by second rows Kevin Cook and Jim Fogarty '90, whose drive managed to hold the Black pack for two set scrums before bowing to the inevitable. Superior loose play by the White forwards resulted, however, in consistent pressure by Williams, and when Bill "Bill Weiss" Weiss '91 hit a drop-kick (worth three points) from twenty meters out to break the tie, the A-side began to roll.

"It's an avalanche, boys!"

So said line captain Ed "one-liner" Anderson '90 after Williams scored a try soon after. The rest of the match was spent inside the Springfield half, as the White backs and forwards dazzled the hard-hitting but one-dimensional Springfield side with frothy, brilliant looping and passing that had the 'tants' heads spinning. Unselfishness was the theme of the day, as the line quickly realized that to keep running was to be crushed, and to pass was to score. The final score, 16-10, does not reflect Williams' superiority, for, despite their lack of tactics, Springfield's defense was excellent.

In the B-side match, the difference between the two clubs was made apparent. The 34-16 Williams victory was satisfying to watch for the bruised A-

Council votes down new Advisor rules

by Tom Dupree

In a 20-12 vote, the College Council voted last Thursday to continue to allow messages of a "purely political nature" to appear in the Daily Advisor.

As a result, the present formal guidelines, which only prohibit "libelous or patently offensive" material in the Daily Advisor, will remain in force, even though students on the Advisor staff had been working under the assumption that no political messages were to be allowed anyway.

Council President Sanand Raghunandan '90 had proposed an amendment, based on a previous draft by former president Trace Blankenship '89, which would have limited the council-run newsletter to announcements of meetings, lectures and other campus events. Only personal messages considered inoffensive, such as birthday greetings, would have been permitted.

Raghunandan said he was concerned that valuable space in the Daily Advisor was being occupied by political messages and was hindering the Advisor's main purpose of announcing meetings and events for the college community. Several council members disagreed, stating that limiting or banning political messages in any way is a form of censorship.

"The College Council is being unfair," Joel McElvain '91 said. "They're patronizing the students. They're saying, 'We know what's best for you.'"

"Tying with censorship" Julieta Lozano '90 said. "We're tying with censorship. People I've talked to would never want to limit people's freedom to say what they want."

One member suggested that political messages could be expressed elsewhere and that the Advisor was not intended to be a forum. Under the amendment, the typist would be responsible for determining what constituted a purely political message.

The amendment was placed on the agenda to end a controversy involving the Williams Atheists, which recently ran two biblical messages in the Advisor. Though the notices had "no intellectual merit and were chosen precisely for this reason," according to an opinions piece by club president Karl Gallo '91 in the Oct. 24 Record, many people still thought the messages inappropriate for the Daily Advisor.

"The messages generated direct feedback," Galle said in a later interview. "People were annoyed. My gut feeling is that the reason [the proposed amendment] came up is all because of this specific incident."

"This is an issue of people not wanting to have to look at stuff they don't like to read. This is all very ironic considering the administration teaches us not to tear down posters, [a form of censorship]. I wish they would concentrate more on having a better rapport with groups than with mandating specific guidelines," he said.

At last Thursday's meeting, the College Council discussed the Daily Advisor's current role of weathervane for campus political trends. (Thomas)

College Council Secretary Manny Pelote '91 reported at the meeting that complaints about the Daily Advisor's content had recently been registered with the Deans Office and with members of the Board of Trustees.

However, the messages should have never gotten into the Daily Advisor in the first place, Karen Schroeder '91, the editor of the Advisor, said that under the draft rules written last year by Blankenship, the newsletter should not have been printing messages of a purely political nature. "A typist screwed up," she said. Raghunandan said that Blankenship's draft proposal was passed unanimously last year. He said he did not understand why this year's finalized proposal, essentially the same as Blankenship's, met with such fierce resistance.

He said, "I'm going to rewrite it and bring a proposal back for final approval," though he was unclear what provisions of the rejected proposal would be kept. The Daily Advisor is an arm of the College Council, edited and prepared by students. Any changes in its regulations must be approved by the council. Schroeder added that it is up to the typist to decide what goes into the Advisor.

Hernandez urges discussion of RA system

by Navin Girishankar

Assistant Dean of the College Andrew Hernandez has said that he is looking into the possibility of a Residential Advisor system at Williams. Though he said that there are no immediate plans to implement the idea, he said that the idea has been discussed on campus.

Hernandez served as a residential advisor instructor and supervisor at the University of California at Santa Cruz as a graduate student and staff member. "There are colleges that have RAs and it works," he said. He emphasized the importance of understanding the concept of RAs, an idea that has been instituted in the housing systems of many colleges and universities around the country.

The difference between RAs and junior advisors at Williams, as Hernandez said, is that RAs are trained in the level of training and the responsibilities of each position. At Williams, junior advisors are trained in peer counseling, first aid, and cardio-pulmonary resuscitation.

But when most students, especially at Williams, think of RAs they think of security spies. Hernandez would not comment in detail on what security- and alcohol-related responsibilities RAs might possess at Williams, but he did say that at other schools RAs generally have master keys to the rooms in dorms. He said that if students do "something wrong or stupid" they would be afraid of RAs, and thus will not like them.

House president problems

Residential advisors would also differ from RAs in that the former would be provided for all of the dorms, not just the freshman entries. Hernandez said that RAs could help to smooth out many of the irregularities of the residential house system at Williams, especially concerning house presidents and house elections.

The College Council last year began an intensive overview of the residential house government system, because of reported irregularities in house elections, room draws and the allocation of house funds. "People don't go to the house president; they come to the dean's office. They may be reluctant to do so. The RA is an intermediary in housing to help facilitate residential life," he said.

In residential housing systems, Hernandez said the student will feel like they can talk to the RA about anything. "In crisis situations, it is good to have someone like that. There is a resource in the house," he said.

He also said that RAs would be helpful

New businesses moving into Bookstore building

by Damon Hemmerdinger

St. Pierre's Barber Shop and The Cow Bell will move into the former Williams Bookstore building on Spring Street, probably by the end of the month. Neither store is, at present, in college-owned space.

Assistant Director of Buildings and Grounds Harold White said that the college wanted tenants in that building, perhaps the most sought-after retail space in all of Williamstown, that would benefit both the student body and the town.

"Once we set up the criteria, it was a pretty easy choice. We wanted to help the businesses on Spring Street. We had a number of people interested, but the choice was pretty clear."

Sarah Campbell, owner of The Cow Bell, had a different impression of the rental process.

"It was a fight. A lot of people wanted it. We've been in line for a college building for a long time," she said.

College-owned space is at a premium in town, White explained. "We try to maintain a reasonable rent which makes our property more attractive."

Campbell said, "We wanted to move

Chaplain's role at Williams debated

by Dan Silverman

The Williams Chaplain's office sponsored a trip to Hartford, Connecticut last week to see an exhibition of the controversial work of late photographer Robert Mapplethorpe. The trip, however, also fueled the debate over just what the roles of the Chaplain's Office at Williams should be.

Chaplain to the College Carol Pepper and eight students went to a showing of the series of Mapplethorpe photos which recently were the center of a national dispute because of the sexually explicit content of some of the photos. Pressure from the National Endowment for the Arts and Capitol Hill, especially Senator Jesse Helms (R-N.C.), led the Corcoran Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C., to cancel its Mapplethorpe exhibition.

The exhibition advanced "gross images of sexual profligacy, sadomasochism and bestial treatment of human beings," Samuel Lipman, former member of the National Council on the Arts, said. The Corcoran cancellation was followed by a Senate Appropriations Committee vote for a five year ban on grants by the NEA to two museums which had helped support Mapplethorpe exhibits.

Williams students expressed mixed opinions about the trip sponsored by the Chaplain's Office. Some thought it was beneficial for the Chaplain to support the introduction of students to sexual and artistic issues.

"I think it's a good idea. I think the opportunity to see [the Mapplethorpe exhibit] should be made available," a Williams junior, who asked not be identified, said.

Others said they found it inappropriate for the Chaplain's Office to sponsor a trip to an exhibition that they saw as a politically non-neutral event, repulsive and blasphemous to some faiths, and containing what some saw as indecent material.

Pepper, who said she is active in sexual rights causes, said she took the trip because she heard Mapplethorpe was a great artist and because the exhibit and the controversy surrounding the exhibit raised issues that were important to members of the Williams community.

'Issues of the body' "I think issues of the body, how safe people feel about their bodies, and how univalent some people feel about their bodies, are important issues," Pepper said.

Pepper also said she was eager to gain insight into these issues by attending an exhibition that directly addressed art-

Hernandez is wrong about RAs

At least once a year, someone seems to start complaining about junior advising and the freshman entry system. Whether it's the Gaudino committee wanting to eliminate entries altogether, or the Dean's Office trying to keep parties out of freshman dorms by fining JAs, the freshman housing system has taken more than its share of abuse.

The latest in a long line of weak criticisms and poor suggestions for reforming freshman life is Dean Hernandez's proposal to institute a residential advisor system at Williams. Although this proposal is not being seriously considered by the college at this time, it is frightening nonetheless in its implications for the future.

Hernandez likes the idea of residential advisors because he feels that they work well at other schools. He suggests they might be more responsible and better-trained than junior advisors because they have received instruction in peer counseling, first aid and CPR. He says that by serving in upperclass houses as well as freshman entries, RAs would be able to facilitate a number of housing disputes that inevitably rise during the year.

All this is well and good, but Hernandez seems to overlook a number of negative aspects to an RA system. For one thing, residential advisors would be paid by the college. As a result, their loyalties would be to the administration and not the students. Because RAs are responsible for enforcing school regulations in a manner that JAs are not, this would destroy the friendly cohesiveness of entries. Freshmen would try to escape the prying eyes of their RAs rather than get to know them as personal friends.

In addition, it is unlikely that upperclassmen would want anything to do with residential advisors living in their houses. They would be viewed not as friends or counselors, but as intruders and spies. No one loves the person who enforces the laws.

Hernandez's fondness for RAs might be a result of his failure to understand the JA system. He said, for example, that the selection process for RAs is more difficult than that for JAs. Since only about one third of those who apply to be JAs are accepted and the JA selection committee spends at least 15 hours a week in meetings for several weeks running, this is difficult to believe. In addition, every good quality that Hernandez sees in residential advising is either already present in the JA system, or could be easily instituted. No one would complain if JAs were to be trained in CPR, for example. To replace or supplement JAs with RAs, however, would be a tragic error. Students simply do not want or need police officers living in their dorms with them.

The fact that residential advising works well at Hernandez's former schools does not mean that it would work well at Williams. The JA system here is simply too popular and successful to be eliminated. Let's hope that the administration shrugs off this proposal as it has done to similarly ill-conceived ones in the past.

To the editor:

I was very pleased to read Brad Gendell's article describing his experience with the off-campus housing problem last summer, for I had a similar experience.

At the end of last year I was considering going off campus, but did not fill out an off-campus application because I had not yet found an apartment (I had filled out the form, I would have lost my on-campus affiliation). I, too, was assured by Dean Hernandez that should I find a place, even though the deadline had already passed, I could still fill out the application. But when I finally did find an apartment at the end of July, Hernandez claimed it was no longer possible because the Town-Gown [Committee] had complained about the large number of students filling up Williamstown. I understand that the deans have a commitment to honor in maintaining good relations with the town, but I should hope they feel the same commitment to honor their word to Williams students.

Prospectus quote was out of context

To the editor:

I was quite surprised and angry this week when a friend told me she saw my quote in the Record ("New Prospectus nice, but Ephs still remember all that 'now,'" October 31). When Mr. Chiu called me last weekend in reference to this article, I distinctly remember saying that I would talk to him about my view, but did not want to be quoted. In other words, I did not wish to be identified. Not only did Mr. Chiu quote me without my permission, he took my quote out of context. I went on to explain that I thought the Prospectus was more interesting in showing Williams in a way that it wants to be perceived by applicants rather than what it may really be like. The photos do not necessarily show Williams because they are posed.

The quote came across as very blunt and unclear. I do not pretend to have the definitive view of Williams. If I had expected to be quoted in the article, I would have been more careful in expressing my views clearly. I hope that in the future, Record reporters will be more careful in their use, or abuse, of their role.

Sports undermine college's purpose

by David Weissbord

Student participation in athletics at Williams College tends to undermine the central missions of the college. It does so in a number of ways: what these ways all share in common is that they divert attention, time, energy, resources and commitment from the institution's primary purpose. Too often students find themselves encouraged to participate in athletics to such a great extent that they are forced to choose between focusing on class work and participating in practices or in the actual athletic events. This is a conflict that we cannot afford to foster here. What are some of the ways in which it is manifested?

There is a certain subcultural ethos that is promoted within the various clubs and varsity sports which tends to be destructive of a sense of unity at this school. Many people would claim that athletic competition fosters school spirit, and in some cases it does. But the net effect is divisive.

The stress on athletics tends to polarize students into two groups: those who wish to be apart from the community as a whole, who cultivate the ethos of a particular sport and are caught up with it; and those students who reject the ethos linked to a particular sport, who view themselves as being here for a loftier, higher purpose.

For this reason, athletics creates strains between students, splitting the college into two obvious groups: those who support the athletic ethos, and those who don't. Most importantly, this pattern puts the student in the awkward position of having to make a choice that he or she should not have to make.

The way that athletics are pursued at Williams gives some warrant to the claim that there is an anti-intellectual climate at the college. The current stress on sports alienates faculty from certain segments of the student population.

Some would say this is a matter of degree, of scaling back the time commitments that athletes have to make. More senior faculty point out that this issue is cyclical: the Williams community seems to need to pull people back every three or four years and remind them of the central mission of the college. But I believe that this is not merely a matter of degree. We face a problem that pits two subgroups within the community against each other as opposing forces. This pattern is in tension with a mode of existing together that strives to realize the best in each individual in whatever one undertakes.

It is also often said that Williams students have a strong competitive drive and that sports are one way of expressing it. But the fact is that what this really is a symptom of is a lack of other unifying forces within a community. There aren't other positive forces to draw on; so the best we can do is to trumpet sports as the only way that people can express their drive for excellence. But clearly this is not ideal. Let's work together to find other forums that allow people to express their drive for excellence -- forums that avoid the kinds of divisive and destructive effects that sports tend to have.

An example of the competitive danger comes from the hiring of a coach here at Williams College, who advertised on her curriculum vitae, as a primary goal, to put Williams College on the map in her Division 3 sport. This shows the extent to which we are prepared to seek out coaches who are highly competitive in intercollegiate athletics.

Wouldn't it be refreshing to see Williams College make a commitment to hiring people whose primary goal is to help sports play an edifying role in their team members' moral and intellectual development? Wouldn't it be refreshing to hear of coaches who incessantly instill in students the values of hard work, the primary goal of which is having that virtue or excellence carry over primarily into other fields?

The central question, then, is whether the college should create a context in which students find themselves faced with the choice between athletics and academics. The question is not whether people should engage in sports as such, or whether sports is a good thing or a bad thing. Instead, the question is: what role should sports have in an institution like Williams College? Should they be thought of as a slight diversion, or as a fundamental part of one's moral and intellectual development?

If sports are in fact to be seen as an integral part of one's moral and intellectual development, we must still wrestle with the question: what is the appropriate context in which sports would exist at Williams? If the primary purpose of this program here is to excel in an array of intercollegiate sports, with the bottom line being to compete successfully against comparable schools, then perhaps we forfeit too much, we give up too much in the process.

End unjust stereotypes, not athletics

by Lisa Wright

The major problem with athletics at Williams is attitude. For whatever reason (and there are a variety of reasons), the community is impressioned by the idea that athletes are a breed apart. The task for our discussion of the subject next week will be to recognize the pervasiveness of this myth of the athlete as different, to begin to understand some of its sources, and thereby (possibly) to minimize the hold that this notion has had on the Williams community.

In the course of a CUL study on athletics at Williams last year, we interviewed a large number of athletes and ex-athletes, JAs, and representatives of the general college population (randomly selected from the Student Directory). All of our interviews to the three groups opened with the same general statement of our original purpose:

"The Committee on Undergraduate Life has undertaken to study our athletes' commitment of time and energy to their chosen sport(s), in the wider context of student life in this community. We are attempting to discover whether the dedication of athletes to their sport(s) helps to integrate our community and to advance the wider purposes of a liberal education, or tends to disintegrate that community and to interfere with those wider educational purposes."

Very early in our investigation, however, we began to believe that this community does indeed have a problem, but that it does not derive from "the dedication of athletes to their chosen sport(s)." Rather, it seems that athletes are victims of unfortunate and unjust social stereotyping, both by other students and by teachers. In the course of our inquiry, we learned a great deal to support this conviction and virtually nothing to refute it. Such stereotyping both (1) tends to fragment our community, opening an unnecessary gap between two forms of educative endeavor (athletic and intellectual) that might and ought to be complementary; and (2) in fact helps shape the behavior that it predicts. And it is particularly insidious because athletes themselves do not simply resent, but have often internalized negative stereotypes -- especially those that presume academic weakness to be an inevitable corollary of academic strength.

Critics of athletics often refer to an attitude that they ascribe to athletes and coaches, namely, the idea that "I am here to play." Quite possibly, this attitude arises more from expectations that pre-date an athlete's Williams experience than from anything that a Williams student has actually said. But the idea does arise -- many of us have heard it articulated -- and is the source of the sort of negative stereotyping that inhibits communication between (those who are perceived as) athletes and non-athletes at Williams.

I believe that there is a need here for "consciousness-raising" and re-education, and that we as a community ought to try to address this need. Last year's CUL collected a few suggestions toward this end; other routes could certainly be pursued as well.

1) Approach the Admissions Officers with questions about admissions criteria (Do academically weak students receive preferential treatment if they are talented athletes, and -- assuming this is not the case, can the Admissions Office do anything to help us refute that assumption?); and about the distribution of athletes in freshman entries (Are they "ghettoized"? If so, ought we to urge that they not be?). 2) Find out how well engaged athletes are represented among the final choices of the JA Selection Committee. Are athletes represented in a number that is sufficient in proportion to the number of athletes in the community at large? If not, what steps might be taken to remedy the imbalance?

3) Propose also that JAs-in-training spend some time considering the particular problems their freshmen athletes might face, most usefully with the advice of those among them who are or have been athletes.

4) Sponsor a forum wherein coaches and academic teachers can meet to clarify their respective needs and aims, to air grievances, and to work toward productive cooperation.

5) Sponsor an open student forum on the "scholar athlete" at Williams.

We invite your response to these suggestions. Several of the ideas have been pursued since our report was completed last year, such as the open forum, "From Soccer to Soccer," that will be held next Monday at 8 p.m. in Baxter. We also need your creative assistance in coming up with other concrete suggestions that can be tried out.

Most importantly, we need to work to improve understanding of the stereotypes that are at work among us. A major step is to encourage collaboration between the teaching faculty and the coaching faculty, as well as among the athletes and non-athletes in our student body.

A negative view of the student-athlete influences the attitudes and actions of many members of this community. Believing it to be both false and damaging, I am moved to attempt to correct it -- whatever its source. The responses of coaches and students to last year's CUL investigation gives me every reason to believe that the students, the coaching faculty and the teaching faculty can and ought to work together in this effort.

Christian Fellowship replies: Bible ought to be studied instead of condemned

by Kook Pyo Hong and Catherine Hirschfeld

We as Christians are aware of the serious consequences our belief in the truth and authority of the Bible as God's communication of God's will to us can have, and we think Karl Galle has legitimately raised this important issue in the October 24 edition of the Record. We appreciate his statement that "denial of or belief in gods is an intensely political and moralistic action" and that "it would be fair to say that we all in our own way question the application of arbitrary creeds to distinguish right from wrong and the obligation to look for otherworldly 'authority'."

As Mr. Galle rightly points out, there is indeed great danger for human beings to hold divine authority or "ideological power" in their hands. "Authority is then wielded by whomever sits in judgment, and the legitimacy of the supernatural backs him up." We would like to make it clear exactly what our recognition of Biblical authority means.

To say that we believe in the "unique, divine inspiration and authority of the Bible," as the Williams Christian Fellowship's statement of faith reads, is to say two things. First, the Bible is God's communication to us of what is true and what is right. Because of this, it has the power and right to determine, influence and direct our lives. It has authority for "teaching, reproving, correcting and training in righteousness" (2 Timothy 3:16).

Second, the Bible's claim to be the infallible Word of God is substantiated and supported by sufficient evidence. We do not wish to give a thorough exposition on Biblical criticism, which would make this article far too long and didactic; but the evidence includes the unity of the Bible, the testimony of the early churches, the witness of history and archaeology and the evidence of changed lives throughout the centuries.

The divine origin of the Bible, however, does not preclude the necessity of critically examining and accurately understanding the Bible. On the contrary, because we believe that the Bible has absolute authority to direct our lives, and because we wish to be correctly directed by it, we are led to take understanding the Bible far more seriously than we take understanding any other text. Different parts of the Bible were written at different times in response to different circumstances. It is impossible to understand the guidance contained in the Bible, particularly the principles behind the guidance, if we do not understand the specific problems to which that guidance is addressed.

To be more specific, in understanding the New Testament letters, we must be aware of the problems faced by the early churches to which these letters were addressed. Mr. Galle quoted in his article "Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law" (1 Corinthians 14:34). This seemingly sexist and offensive verse is clarified if we recognize that the letter was addressed to a church in which women were known to have interrupted the church services by speaking about their thoughts as far as any individuals can, because we do believe that if we earnestly seek to understand the Bible as God intended us to, it is possible with God's assistance. Christians have been guilty of doing wrong many times in the name of Truth and divine authority, whether from misinterpreting God's Word or from deliberately twisting it in order to justify personal ends, and we are completely opposed to this. This does not reflect, however, on the genuine precepts of authority as Jesus himself taught in the Bible. Many of us question the authority

But we must remember that the Bible is not organized into paragraphs dealing with specific issues, so that all the guidance would be found on one subject in one power-packed dose. Instead, the Bible is a collection of different sorts of writing addressing many different issues simultaneously. As a result, it must be considered as a whole. After all, life does not present us with neatly packaged issues but presents us with dilemmas that incorporate many different issues.

Perhaps the message in Romans was intended for people who were unjustly disobeying authority. Considering another verse from the Bible that "We must obey God rather than men" (Acts 5:29), it seems Christianity encourages us to honor our duties to God and to our conscience, and if these conflict with our duty to the governing authority, then we are entitled to disobey man and follow God. Was that not the principle for the late Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. and his Christian civil disobedience?

Certainly the specific issues raised by Mr. Galle are not as easily understandable and agreeable upon as some of the more central teachings of the Bible are, and we do not pretend to speak for all Christians, or even for every member of the Williams Christian Fellowship. Nevertheless, we are speaking for the Fellowship as far as any individuals can, because we do believe that if we earnestly seek to understand the Bible as God intended us to, it is possible with God's assistance.

Christians have been guilty of doing wrong many times in the name of Truth and divine authority, whether from misinterpreting God's Word or from deliberately twisting it in order to justify personal ends, and we are completely opposed to this. This does not reflect, however, on the genuine precepts of authority as Jesus himself taught in the Bible. Many of us question the authority of a father over a child, not because the authority itself is wrong, but because there exist many bad fathers. Likewise the danger of the Bible's authority rests not in the authority of the Bible itself, but in the fallibility and imperfection of man.

As people living in a pluralistic society, all of us inherently make choices of authority, and as Christians, we place that authority in the Bible as the Word of God. There is certainly a legitimate danger in doing so for it is, as Mr. Galle stated, a "fundamental transfer of loyalty from the human to the supernatural." But as the imperfections of human authority discourage us from placing our faith in it, we recognize that it is only in loyalty to God, who loves all people equally, that we can be truly loyal to humanity. As the Bible reminds us -- "And what does the Lord require of you? To act justly and to love mercy and to walk humbly with your God" (Micah 6:8) -- we wish to be Christians in the only sense that Jesus wishes anyone to be.

In the pluralism of society, we wish to extend dignity to those people whose beliefs are different from ours, and we wish to exercise any authority with humility, respect and love for others. Mr. Galle wrote, "Whether people believe in gods or devils or werewolves or Bigfoot is of relatively little concern to me if left at that point. What I care very deeply about is the use of such beliefs to further political ends."

We disagree with him and say that our beliefs move us to the moral and political actions which they dictate, rather than being the tool of pre-existing political ends. Because of this, whether we believe in gods, devils, werewolves or Bigfoot is of great significance. As people who "dangerously" place authority in the supernatural, we invite you to look at the Bible and Jesus himself to make informed decisions for yourselves.

Music review: Kinks take a dive with new album U.K. Jive

by Tony Elison

The Kinks? Of course... "You Really Got Me," "All Day and All of the Night," "A Well Respected Man," "Come Dancing," "Do It Again," "I'm Glad I'm a Man, but so's Lola."

Sorry, this is 1989. In spite of the untarnished luster of their musical legacy, it's hard to believe that the Kinks are still together as a recording and performing unit, redefining "dinosaur rock" with their every move.

Even harder for me to fathom is how I ever presented a seemingly persuasive and convincing argument just seven weeks ago to my roommate comparing the Kinks to Williams College. My main point had something to do with a tense balance between universal fame and critical acclaim.

Occasionally, however, some sort of extraneous variable comes along and destabilizes the delicate equilibrium: something such as, say, an embarrassing truckload of snow or an architectural eyesore. In the Kinks' case, their latest act of counterproductive masochism carries the title U.K. Jive and has been available since Halloween.

It's simply quite difficult to find anything kind to say about this album. In the past 25 years, most of the Kinks' self-destructive behavior could be rationalized, either by dismissing Ray Davies as a neurotic out of his time, or by nervously laughing incidents off as enhancement of their twisted legend. U.K. Jive has no such excuses; its lack of any sort of musical or thematic cohesion is shameful.

The Kinks apparently fail to understand that by virtue of their prominence in the pantheon of rock music, they are judged on a separate level from the journeymen and foreigners of this mixed-up, muddled-up, shook-up world.

Indeed, it is perhaps the Kinks' manifest mishandling of their own status which is the most disturbing feature of this album. Upon listening to its contents, the Kinks' desperate attempts to compete with contemporaries such as the Rolling Stones and the Who by self-consciously billing themselves as "the world's premiere rock 'n' roll band" (as the stickers on U.K. Jive advertise) seem immature and disgraceful.

Perhaps it would have been better for the Kinks to have taken a five-year hiatus and released a recording worthy of their past; certainly such a course of action was more than vindicated by the quality of the Stones' Steel Wheels.

More than any pointless advertising gimmicks, however, the Kinks' shame lies in their music. Why should one of history's most innovative and expressive bands feel compelled to release a magpie's nest of European and overproduced schmalz?

The pilot single, "How Can I Get Close?" wastes an intriguing lyric in a musical context reminiscent of Heart and the Scorpions; "Entertainment," one of the songs billed on the as sticker as "a new hit," is an unlistenable misuse of the main riff from Steel Wheels; "Rock and a Hard Place." The three Dave Davies compositions are interesting only in their psychological implications: fraternal strife drives younger brother with inferiority implications to heavy-metal outbursts?

The heartache of listening to the Kinks lose their own identity in a mess of reverberant synthesizers is enough to make even the most devoted fans cringe. But, then again, Kinks fans have always reveled in their idols' incompetence; and, as always, each album contains at least one glimmer of tantalizing hope.

Of all the songs on U.K. Jive, the title cut alone rises magically from the surrounding squalor to transcend Genero-pop and enter that Kingdom where Dave's guitar still crunched, Ray's lyrics still touch, amuse, and soothe, and the Kinks are "the world's premiere rock 'n' roll band."

It's an asexual orgasm for damn-fool Kinks fans like myself, and until the next track comes on, for a space of just three minutes and forty-nine seconds, I'm glad that the Kinks are always there to Do It Again.

Winter Study trips focus on art, culture

by Eric Chiu

The Hangchow Bore in Moonlight, by 13th century artist Li Sung, is one of the many works in Taiwan's National Palace Museum that will be seen by students on the winter study trip Chinese Art and Society (ARTH 025).

Joseph, religion, and societal values are embodied in Chinese architecture. "It's a great way to be totally immersed in Chinese culture. I have always wanted to see traditional calligraphy and painting first-hand," Eric Matson '92, one of the students participating in the trip, said.

"Art is the absolute embodiment of culture. I saw this quote from the exhibition of Huang Pin-hung [at the Williams College

"If I go with a concrete goal in mind I might be disappointed. So I'm going to empty my mind as much as possible. It's called planned spontaneity."

Museum of Art. I think this idea really applies to this trip," Matson added. Kyungah Yoon '90 echoed these sentiments. "Through my background, which is Korean, and my studies in Japanese at Williams I've realized how much both countries were influenced by China. I like to get the idea of Chinese art in Taiwan."

Matson said he was also influenced by the religious aspect of Chinese culture. "Your whole attitude is what counts, I think. On this trip I'm going to take as much of a ture." Lecturer in Theatre Deborah Brothers said, Brothers led the trip when it was first offered two years ago.

"We want Williams students to see examples of non-Western theater. It is a very intensive exposure to Japanese theater," she said.

"We saw the influence of religion on Japanese theater. Theater is derived originally from the rituals of religion. In Japanese theater, this influence from religion, in particular Shinto, can be observed clearly. The tour gives you a different perspective on a culture that we normally do not see."

The group will travel around Japan in an attempt to experience different aspects of Japanese theater and culture. The trip includes visits to temples and Noh Theater in Kyoto, the Takarazuka Review, the Bugaku Dances and Music on Adult Day (January 15) in Nara, and various performances and a backstage tour of the National Theatre in Tokyo.

A learning experience

"It's the Williams thing to do," Bob Sanders '90, one of the participants, said. "I know absolutely nothing about the culture of Japan. It will be a great learning experience."

This time the tour will be led by Assistant Professor of Theatre David Eppel. The cost is $3,000, which includes air transportation from New York, transportation, housing and some meals in Japan, as well as all theatre tickets, entrance fees, and lunches.

The Winter Study in Italy program is a travel course in art. The trip is offered primarily for the first year students in the art history graduate program.

"The focus is on the cultural context of the artistic works," Professor of Art Samuel Edgerton, who is conducting the trip, said. "Of course, we will also eat well."

Many of the students seems to be looking forward to savoring this part of the experience. "We're supposed to drink a lot of wine, have fun, and see museums," said Susan Foster 'GR91.

Robert Lach 'GR90, who was on the trip last year, said he found it a wonderful experience. "The parties in Venice were absolutely spectacular," he said. "There were lines, gallons of wine. The wine was great," Lach said.

The tour will visit Rome, Assisi, Umbria hill towns, Florence and environs, Siena, Bologna, Ravenna, Padua, Venice and surroundings, and Milan.

The cost is about $1,900, which includes all cost except personal expenses, lunches, and dinners. The trip is closed, but undergraduates are encouraged to apply next year.

Phish to splash at Thursday's S.A.C. bash

by Derek Schilling

It's spawning time, and Burlington, Vermont's hottest and slickest act, Phish (yes that's P-I-I-sh) are making their way down to the Berkshires for a much anticipated first appearance at Williams. The group will be playing in Mission dining hall Thursday at 9:00 p.m., sponsored by the Student Activities Council.

But you've never heard of Phish? Natives of the Green Mountain state know that these four wacky guys -- and accomplished musicians -- have become a virtual institution since their formation in 1983 at the University of Vermont.

Dedicated "Phish-Heads" might have bootlegs from sellout shows at Boston's Paradise Club. They may have heard that the band headlined earlier this year, or know that Sting apologized personally to the band for missing out on one of their 1988 gigs in Colorado.

For the small but steadily growing cult of initiates to Phish's music and non-attitude, these guys defy any conceptions of musicians as generally being cocky. Phish is a real sensation whose live shows transcend ordinary musical experience.

Phish's music has been compared to artists as diverse as Frank Zappa and Led Zeppelin.

Principal songwriter Trey Anastasio (lead guitar, vocals) fronts the current lineup of Phish, which includes Page McConnell on keyboards, bassist Mike Gordon, and drummer (and brass player) Jon Fishman, whose surname is the source of the band's name.

Phish's music, with its free-improvisational feel and penchant for the zany and its edge, has been compared on to artists as diverse as Frank Zappa and Led Zeppelin.

In their tightness, communication, and the creative interaction they often achieve on stage, they also merit a comparison to certain jazz quartets. The band has even moonlighted as a jazz combo to exercise their chops and to pay tribute to some of their more refined stylistic influences, such as Charlie Parker and Duke Ellington.

Anastasio has digested and incorporated so many diverse musical influences into his songwriting and the group's playing style that Phish has become a "celebration of music." But while Phish's music is an admixture of all these styles, it is none of these.

"Phish sounds like Phish all the time," Jon Palaska, the band's manager, said. According to him, the band has reached the stage in artistic development where they have their own distinctive style. After practicing up to five or six hours a day at their big house up in Burlington (remind you of the Band and Big Pink?),

Phish has evolved from four talented musicians into a coherent unit, one that defies easy classification.

If Phish music itself breaches stylistic barriers, Anastasio's lyrics transcend the ordinary as well. With originals like "Reba," about a crazed woman who discovers a new way to make meat, or "AC/DC Bag," a vignette detailing the escapades of a robot programmed as an executioner, Anastasio displays an entertaining wit which attests that the band never makes the mistake of taking themselves too seriously.

Phish's repertoire of originals now includes over sixty songs, with instrumental classics, like "Goli Apparatus" (12) and "David Bowie," which often become extended jams on stage. Anastasio, while a senior at Goddard College in Vermont, also penned "The Man Who Stepped into Yesterday," a political, Tolkienesque prose epic featuring lizards and set in the world of Gamache.

Many Phish originals draw lyrics from the epic, and this material, along with narration and choreography, is now crystallizing into a full hour-and-half performance art piece. This may eventually be properly recorded and compiled as a concept album, complete with story notes. But don't expect to see and hear the epic in its entirety; the band will most likely feature material from its soon-to-be-released debut.

The country-tinged "O-Kee-Pa Ceremony," "Split Open and Melt," "Punch You in the Eye," and "In a Hole" are examples of Phish originals which may be played Thursday night. Also watch for some select covers. Lately they've been serving up historic versions of AC/DC's "Highway to Hell," Zeppelin's "Good Times Bad Times," and the James Gang's "Walkaway."

Phish plan to do a proper tour this coming winter and spring, so don't miss out on the opportunity to catch them here on the east coast. A Halloween show held in a barn last week at Goddard College buried the place down -- these guys should be cutting off fire alarms all over Mission. Happy Phishing!

Sting overshadows Threepenny Opera

by F. M. Gruenke

The new production of Bertolt Brecht's The Threepenny Opera opening at the Lunt-Fontaine Theater on Broadway this weekend has attracted a lot of attention because of the casting of Sting as Mackie, or Mackie the Knife. The speculation, however, about his merits as an actor seems to have directed attention away from the real problem of the play. This is the same today as it was in 1949, when the musical first opened. It is the problem of alienation vs. empathy, or how to get the audience to think, as Brecht said in his "Notes to the Threepenny Opera," "about the flow of the play" rather than "from within the flow of the play." The ultimate success of any production depends on how this problem is resolved.

If someone else offers to pay for your ticket, you may as well go; it's not bad, it's just not Brecht.

The performance began promisingly, with the declaration by the narrator that the show was written and performed by beggars, at the price of three pennies, so that even beggars could afford to see it. At $12 a lousy seat at a preview, none of us were tempted to forget ourselves and become involved in the "reality" of the action on the stage, so the first moments of the show, calculated to alienate, were clearly successful.

However, the next alienating device, after the overture when the actors onstage applauded the hand (also onstage), was sadly overshadowed one act later by the entrance of Sting, whose mere presence was spontaneously applauded by the audience.

This was symptomatic of the ambivalence of the entire production. On one hand, the audience was constantly challenged to think by the discontinuous and disorienting contradiction of form and content, while on the other they had come (in most cases, judging from the applause) already liking Sting and expecting to see and enjoy Sting acting.

Sting's show, and clearly could not expect to be a financial success if the audience was continually forced to retreat from its emotional involvement with Sting's character and the story surrounding it to awareness of themselves and critical thought. Empathy and identification were simply necessary and unavoidable.

This prior identification, which undermined the musical before it even began, was, unfortunately, only one of the various problems which riddled the production. Many of the alienating devices, such as the characters' casual interaction with the stage curtain, the titles of the songs projected onto screens on both sides of the stage, and the narrator singing a song to the audience while periodically checking behind himself to see if the stage was ready for the next scene, were remarkably ineffective.

This was not due to any discernible flaw in their execution, but rather raises larger questions of the general effectiveness of such tactics 40 years after Brecht first so successfully employed them.

Accustomed as we are to the self-awareness of artistic endeavors (or even to Ferris Bueller directly addressing the audience), perhaps the shock value of alienating devices is too diluted to work as it once did. On the contrary, such devices seem to impart a sense of conspiracy to the actor-audience relationship (witness Ferris Bueller) that actually fosters the emotional involvement that it was originally intended to destroy. This particular form of involvement is particularly insidious in this production, predisposed as the audience was towards Sting.

As for the rest of the performers, they ranged from excellent (Georgina Brown as Mrs. Peachum, Suzanne Douglas as Jenny Diver, and Ethyl Eichelberger as the Ballad Singer, who were all rich, full over-stuffed characters who, at the same time, maintained full separation from the audience), to inspired and uninspired (Maurice McGovern as Polly Peachum), to completely opaque and puzzling (Alvin Epstein, whose Mr. Peachum made little sense).

If someone else offers to pay for your ticket (and gets decent seats), you may as well go; it's not bad, it's just not Brecht. If you're contemplating driving three or four hours to New York City and shelling out at least $52 for a ticket yourself, you may want to reconsider.

ARTS IN VIEW

November 8 At 4:15 p.m., a studio recital featuring Kathleen Reilly '90, violin, accompanied by Nicole Ferran '93, piano, music by Saint-Saens; Karen Gray '92, voice, Carolyn Koo '92, piano, music by Barber and Schubert; Paul Gasper '92, violin, Dennis Kuo '93, piano, music by Saint-Saens, will be held in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall.

November 9 At 4:00 p.m., a studio recital featuring the student string orchestra under the direction of Douglas Moore, music by Bach and Cowell, will take place in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall.

in dorms where the house government system may not be working particularly well. "Some of the bigger houses, such as Mission Park, where there tends to be more damage and vandalism and less communication among people, might be a place where an RA type system might work as an experiment," he said. "There will be RAs in that building because it is so big. It would be able to take some of the load off presidents."

In many universities with the residential life systems, RAs are remunerated for their services in terms of full room and board and in some instances a salary. Hernandez said that with the remuneration comes expectations that are much higher. "The selection process for RAs is much more rigorous." RAs are further required to attend staff meetings and have time periods during which they are on duty.

Negative connotations Hernandez admitted that he is fighting an uphill battle in having the concept seriously discussed at Williams. He said that the term "residential advisor" had a negative connotation here for two reasons: Williams students hear negative things about RAs at other schools, and they prize the unique nature of the JA system.

"My sense of Williams is that students come here and say, 'Hey, wow, we have a very different system here,' and they want to maintain it," he said.

Several students interviewed agreed with this analysis. Adam Grossman '93 said, "I think that the JA system is what makes Williams so unique. I know a couple of people who go to UVM. The students treat [the RAs] as police officers, like delegates from the administration. Well, this person is getting paid to be an asshole."

Up for discussion Still, Hernandez emphasized that the idea was nowhere near an implementation stage. "There's no plan to have RAs at Williams," Hernandez said. "I don't think it's going to be something that a lot of people are going to jump up and down about and say, 'Hey, let's do it.' My goal was just to get it out into the community — just an idea that I think, down the road, Williams may want to look at."

He said that the idea of adopting a residential advisor system has caught on in smaller campuses such as Vassar and Amherst colleges. Amherst has initiated the institution of a residential counselor system already. "The RA thing is just people to help you. At a small school it freshmen become adversaries of the junior advisers you'd have more dignity."

Nathaniel Healy '91, a junior advisor, said, "Having JAs is what makes Williams unique from a place like the University of Vermont, where you have RAs and everybody is an individual and nobody really cares. I know a couple of people who go to UVM. The students treat [the RAs] as police officers, like delegates from the administration. Well, this person is getting paid to be an asshole."

He said that the idea of adopting a residential advisor system has caught on in smaller campuses such as Vassar and Amherst colleges. Amherst has initiated the institution of a residential counselor system already. "The RA thing is just something that I raised just to see what kind of feedback I get from the community. And I get this real sense that this is not a Williams thing to do. And so I'm not pushing it," Hernandez said.

He added that the official at Vassar who was in charge of the RA program was not enthusiastic about it. Hernandez said that the off-campus housing system at Williams is overly bureaucratic and insensitive to students.

"I'm just saying, 'Hey, check it out.' When you go visit a friend in another school, find out what they think about the RA." He is convinced of the success of the JA program for freshmen here in the strongly autonomous environment at Williams. He added of the current housing arrangement, "I think 99 percent of it works. I just think that every once in a while you get a house that doesn't work."

But one student who has seen the RA system up close doesn't like it. Abigail Zankovsk '92, a transfer student from Columbia University, a school that has RAs, said, "[The RAs] had disciplinary roles. They were supposed to make sure that people weren't drinking. If we were drinking, we had to drink behind closed doors. They were theoretically supposed to report us," she said.

Hernandez describes off-campus rules

by Navin Girishenkar

Assistant Dean of the College Andrew Hernandez responded to claims that the off-campus housing system at Williams is overly bureaucratic and insensitive to students.

"I'm just saying, 'Hey, check it out.' When you go visit a friend in another school, find out what they think about the RA." He is convinced of the success of the JA program for freshmen here in the strongly autonomous environment at Williams. He added of the current housing arrangement, "I think 99 percent of it works. have any disciplinary problems, can have permission to go off-campus and they can't go through room draws."

He added that in May, after the housing selection process, a certain number of students would be enabled to go off campus after another application process. "Students should know that as of right now, we'll take the applications, we'll count them up. If we get 100 to 110, we're in good shape. If we get 170-180, I don't know, it means we'll have to think of a way to make a fair process."

He has rejected the idea of a first-come first-serve basis for allocating off-campus housing because of the high inefficiency it would cause. "Having people camp out in front of B & G in January doesn't seem like a good idea."

"The basic unknown right now is that when we do give these applications out in January for off-campus, how many are we going to get back? ... That's all going to be number-driven and that's one thing about Williams — we're learning that we've got to get a better sense of how these numbers are going to work."

THE MOUNTAINS

WORDS AND Music by Dr. Washington Gladden, Williams Class of 1859

O, proudly rise the monarchs of our mountain land
With their kingly robes to the sky
Where Alma Mater dwells with her chosen band,
And the peaceful river flows gently by.

CHORUS:

The mountains! the mountains! we greet them with a song
Whose echoes, rebounding their woodland heights along,
Shall mingle with anthems that winds and fountains sing,
Till hill and valley gaily, gaily, ring.

The snows of Winter crown them with a crystal crown,
And the silver clouds of Summer round them cling;
The Autumn's scarlet mantle flows in richness down,
And they revel in the garments of Spring.

O, mightily they battle with a storm-king's power;
And conquerors shall triumph here for aye
Yet quietly their shadows fall at evening hour,
While the gentle breezes round them softly play.

Beneath their peaceful shadows may old Williams stand
Till sun and mountains never more shall be
The glory and the honor of our mountain land,
And the dwelling of the gallant and the free.

Married profs teach in the Purple Valley

by Bridget McManus

"It's very helpful to be able to talk to someone about what you're doing and what you have in common," said Associate Professor of Mathematics Olga Beaver said about her marriage. Yet while spouses sharing a career is not all that uncommon, both of them teaching at the same school is a rarity.

Beaver, whose husband is Professor of the History of Science Donald Beaver, is just one Williams spouse who spoke about the advantages of such a relationship.

Associate Professor of Computer Science William Lenhart, who is married to Assistant Professor of Mathematics Deborah Bergstrand, agreed. He said that being able to talk about research and work with his wife is one of the benefits of sharing a profession.

"We talk about teaching a lot," Bergstrand said. She added that this way of taking work home has improved her teaching in the classroom. "If one of us has a class that went well, we have support from the other person. If one of us has a class that didn't go so well, it helps to have someone sympathetic to the fact that not every class is going to go 100 percent beautifully."

"As far as being a better teacher, we can talk about what did go wrong," Bergstrand said. "Since our disciplines are so close together, we can help each other devise better examples to illustrate concepts. We ask each other for advice designing homework and exams and preparing lectures."

Assistant Professor of English Lisa Wright is in a slightly different situation; her husband also works in the Deans Office. She said that Assistant Dean of the College Steven Wright's knowledge about Williams from an administrative point of view gives her additional insight into the affairs of the school.

"By collaborating our two experiences, we get more than just the addition of the two," she said.

"Teaching enriched"

"We can help each other understand different aspects of student life," she added. "Our different perspectives help us to texture our sense of students' lives. My teaching is enriched."

Donald Beaver described why the closeness husbands and wives share is especially helpful: "Since you have a close relationship with trust established, you can have frank and open discussions about students, methods and problems." He said that this translates into better teaching.

Sharing the experience of teaching at Williams also seems to enrich life at home for the professors. Olga Beaver pointed out the practical benefits. "Our schedules are the same, we have the same vacations. And it's helpful in a funny way. Since we're always talking about similar things, neither partner feels singled in discussing jobs, as if theirs is less important."

"Being a faculty member here is extremely demanding,"

A happy couple, Professor of the History of Science Donald Beaver and Associate Professor of Mathematics Olga Beaver enjoy the advantages of teaching at Williams. (Thomas)

Lenhart explained, "and having the same job makes each of us sympathetic to the other." Bergstrand also said, "It's nice to have your primary support person — your spouse — attuned to your experiences so they can be sympathetic."

"Talking shop"

Lisa Wright said, "There's no prescription against talking shop [at home] — we live it and love it. We each know fully what the other is talking about and we both care about it." She added that her marriage is better balanced and more relaxed than before her husband was employed by the college.

Still, the demands of the academic world can make life hectic for married professors. Beaver said, "Because we're active in different departments and have interests in different aspects of the college, life can be hectic, such as when we each have committee meetings."

Lisa Wright added, "In many cases it's like having jobs that aren't connected." She said the demands of their jobs sometimes mean she and her husband don't see each other for days at a stretch. But she believes the similarity between her job and Dean Wright's helps each of them understand the stress the other is under, so they're sympathetic rather than angry when the other is busy.

The Record is pleased to announce its first annual MOUNTAINS SINGING CONTEST this Friday, November 10 at 4 PM in Baxter Hall.

A distinguished panel, thoughtfully chosen by the Record, will judge all interested groups of from 10 to 50 people. Groups must demonstrate a knowledge of the words to our alma mater (the words, for those who don't yet know it, are on the right) and a musical rendition that tickles the judges' fancy.

This contest is open to all members of the school community (professors and administrators are more than welcome), but organized singing groups will not be allowed to enter as a group.

Men's soccer posts three shutout wins

by Jeff Merritt

The Williams men's soccer team took the first steps towards winning both the ECAC and Little Three championships in the past week, with three shutout victories in a span of four days.

On Thursday, November 2, the Ephs crushed Bridgewater State College 5-0 in the opening round of the ECAC Division III New England regionals. The Ephs won the New England regional with a 3-0 defeat of the Amherst Lord Jeffs on Sunday. In between these two home wins the squad sandwiched a slim 1-0 victory at Wesleyan on Saturday, leaving Amherst as the only obstacle to another Little Three title.

Williams was seeded first in New England for the ECAC tournament, and they proved that they deserved this honor by dominating the contest against Bridgewater. Doug Brooks '90 opened the scoring for the Ephs with a tally just over 17 minutes into the game. The goal was set up by Sam McIlvain '90, who made a great sliding pass to direct a loose ball in the penalty area to Brooks. Stationed about 10 feet from the goal, Brooks had no trouble lifting the ball into the upper right corner of the net. It was his fifth goal on the season, which is second on the team to junior Rob Lake.

Laurin Laderoute '92 made the score 2-0 three minutes later. The play started when Brooks broke in against a lone Bridgewater defender. He could not beat him completely, but Laderoute was trailing the play and pounced on the loose ball. The sophomore beat the Bridgewater goalkeeper, Jeff Forbes, into the lower left-hand corner of the net.

The Ephs added to their lead with a little more than 15 minutes gone in the second half. Captain Dan Calichman '90 lofted a long pass onto the feet of Ambi Stem '90 in the penalty area, and Stem beat Forbes with a low shot into the right corner of the net.

Forbes was forced to leave the game 10 minutes later, as he injured his ankle jumping to defend against a harmless shot that sailed way over the crossbar. His replacement did not fare any better, as the Ephs netted on two more goals in the final 20 minutes of the game.

Lake and freshman Shawn Allen scored these two goals, winding up a convincing 5-0 victory for Williams. The Ephs outshot Bridgewater by an 18-5 margin, and the defense turned in another stellar performance, led by Calichman, senior Rob Swann, and juniors Steve Bailey and John Kennel.

Chuck Goldfarb '92 played a steady game in goal for Williams, coming up with two saves on the day. After alternating his goalkeeping all season, Coach Michael Russo has settled on Goldfarb as his starter for the tournament.

Defectors sent packing Williams advanced to the ECAC Division III tournament with a well-played 3-0 victory over Amherst on Sunday at Cole Field. The Ephs established offensive pressure early on and kept the Defectors on the defensive throughout the contest.

McIlvain and Lake both saw good scoring chances go for naught in the first portion of the half, but this duo eventually teamed up for the first Williams goal. Lake sent a perfect pass upfield, and McIlvain controlled the ball outside the penalty area and then drilled it into the top of the net.

The Ephs outshot the Lord Jeffs 12-2 for the first 45 minutes, but held only a one-goal lead at halftime. The Williams attack remained strong in the second

Women's soccer wins NIAC tournament

by Kevin Greenberg

Early last week the women's soccer team got some good news from the NIAC tournament selection committee: not only was it in the tournament, but it was also the top-seeded team and tournament host.

"A lot of us were just hoping to slip into the tournament so we were so excited to not only get in but to host it," said co-captain Susie Piper '90.

The team went on to create some even better news, as they defeated Smith and Colby by identical 1-0 scores to win the tournament. The victories marked the end of a season that started with an 0-3 start and finished with the team at 10-6.

"It's a real nice way to finish," said Coach Lisa Melendy. "We had such a struggling start and tried to hang in there and show that we were as good a team as we thought we were."

The Ephs were led throughout the tournament, and the season, by strong play in the midfield area from both the halfbacks and the fullbacks. "They've just been getting used to playing with each other and are now more confident of themselves... and confidence is a big part of defense," said Melendy.

The defense was at a disadvantage last weekend, playing without season-long starter Jen Plansky '92, who was out with a broken nose. Pat Bentley '92 replaced Plansky at stopper.

Another defensive player who was in the spotlight last weekend was co-captain Jeannette Owen '90. Owen got an assist on the only Williams goal, a shot by Kelly Collins '90. The goal came with 35:15 left in the first half on one of the Ephs' first 20 shots.

But the defense had controlled the play limiting Smith to only six shots on goal and Colby to only two. And that defense just improved in the final game against Colby.

Colby only managed two shots in the 90 minute game and the ball was in the Mules' side of the field for all but 4:27 of the second half. In the second stanza, Williams allowed Colby only five pseudo-scoring opportunities, none of which even resulted in a shot on goal.

Colby did manage one strong scoring challenge with 7:58 remaining in the game, as forward Tracey Bishop got past Carin Cole '91 and streaked down the right side towards the Williams goal. Cole came up with a big play from behind, however, as she knocked the ball away from Bishop to preserve the 1-0 lead.

The Ephs had taken the lead on a goal by Sharon Glick '93 with 24:35 left in the second half. Collins hit a high ball into the middle where Glick went to head the ball. But she was knocked down by the goalie who slapped the ball out of the penalty box before falling down.

Williams retained possession and Melissa Thaxton '93 got the ball to Glick who, like the keeper, had regained her feet. Glick lofted a shot from about 25 yards out over the outstretched goalie into the far side of the net.

The goal was all the defense needed to win the tournament for the first time in its third consecutive attempt.

Women's rugby A's and B's fall to Yale, Vassar

by Kristin Moomaw, Rebekah Timlin and Amanda Gallagher

The WWRFC hosted the Evil Elis last weekend for A-side's second home match of the season while the Killer B's travelled south to avenge Vassar. Though the A-side ended its scoring drought, they were unable to "outpace victimism", losing a heartbreaking close duel 6-4. The youthful B-side played tough against an experienced Vassar, but couldn't hold the Vassar Vixens down for long, losing 22-0.

The A-side game opened with an excellent kick by Katy "I may not be tan but I'm tanner than you, Lapoy" Carr '91. The white line burst well, and passed the ball quickly to keep the action moving down the field, while Sue "Stairway to Hell" Pitcher '90 stripped the ball, taking it down the field 10 yards. Seniors Kristin "We're still waiting" Moomaw and Amanda "Sweet tooth" Gallagher won most of the lineouts, while A-side debut Briar "The Bard" McNutt broke through the lost lineouts to sack the Yale scrumhalf, Heather "AT&T" Adams '90 kicked beautifully during the game showing her expertise in both booting and squibbing. Adams also went weakside on several occasions, confusing the Bulldogs and gaining considerable yardage.

A-side opens scoring A-side debut Timmie Friend '90 showed good judgment throughout the game, keeping a cool head while repeatedly sacking the opposing scrumhalf to slow down the Yale offense. Wing Gina "The Arm" Coleman '90 broke free with the ball and ran twenty yards, putting Williams in a good position to score. In a jumbo effort, Rebekah Timlin '90 scooped the ball from the ensuing scrumdown and dished it off to Friend, who touched it down for a picture-perfect try. Carr was incredibly close on her conversion attempt, despite the nearly impossible angle, but the half ended with Williams leading 4-0.

Yale kicked off in the second half and penetrated deep into the Williams defensive zone. Carr defended her honor well, with her great kicks from behind the 22. Senior Jackie "I want to ruck with you" Graves fired up some great runs, bursting through the bedazzled Bulldogs. Just moments later, Graves showed her defensive talent as well, diving under the ball. Flyhacking as a matter of principle, the Elis played a dirty second half. After eating a few Blue elephants, White became more timid about picking the ball up off the ground, and, with eight minutes left in the half, a stampeding Bulldog broke free from a maul and gracelessly touched the ball down. The Yale fullback converted the try, giving Yale a 6-4 lead. With only a few minutes left, things looked bleak for the White Dogs. Nevertheless, the Williams women would not give up. Coleman brought the ball within meters of the try zone, only to be frustrated by the game-ending whistle. Commenting on the cheap playing of the

by Chris Blackburn

Last weekend the WRFRC followed the course of its forebears, carving a path up Route 7 deep into snowy Middlebury, where the Panthers awaited the Ephs with open arms. The next morning, the Middlebury pitch was a fairly surreal scene, as the bright, crisp sunlight lanced into a pitch that was six inches deep in mud. The A-side staggered and squeaked onto the bog and into a match which took them by surprise.

Oh, yes, it was cold, and it was muddy, as the first half dragged on scorelessly, both sides looking more than a bit flat. Back and forth wandered the rugger, as the good play of the Williams pack provided the ball repeatedly to the frustrated backs, who were unable to move at speed or control the ball with any grace. Eventually, the Panthers committed a penalty around 25 meters out, within easy range of senior Dan Foote's boot. As the kick sailed over, making the score 3-0 Williams, hope rose in the breasts of those watching. Perhaps this would be enough.

One-panther team

Unfortunately for the White Dogs, the Middlebury standoff had other plans. All day, this fellow, an English-under-19 all-star, had been keeping the ball to himself, and finally he broke through the Williams line so quickly that the pack support could not contain him, and a try was scored for Middlebury. With the score 4-3 Middlebury at the half, and the temperature rising infinitesimally, the A-side scrum took control of the game. Controlled, possession rugby marched the A's to within a 5-meter scrum of the try line. Hooker Red "Rob" Phay '90 won the ball cleanly, and the pack began to march, but just at the last moment the fates whisked the ball out of the scrum and into chaos, where it was met by a wall of Panthers, and the try was denied.

After that divine intervention, further effort by the A-side, although heroic, was clearly futile, as one chance after another failed to reach fruition. The Panther standoff, not one to miss a predestined moment, took the ball for a thirty-meter jaunt into the try zone to make it 8-3 as time wound down. The final play of the afternoon summed up the match for the A-side, as a brilliant overload sprang Scott Brown '90 into open field 50 meters out, from whence a score was inevitable. The pass was slightly forward, however, and instead of the winning try it was the final whistle.

Lower-side sweep

The B-side match was a different story entirely. The chemistry of this side, combined with the high emotions engendered by the previous match's frustra-

Opinion

The need to confront sexism

by Ann Mantil

Being a woman at Williams is relatively easy. Relatively in terms of other minorities, easy in terms of the apathy with which most women face their situation here. Sailing through four years without ever having to confront sexism isn't too difficult. A few comments met with an uncertain smile and awkward silence, a couple of display cases glanced at and then forgotten ... no big deal.

When I was trying to write this piece, I first tried to reflect on my experiences as a woman here. I remembered being a first-semester freshman in English 301, totally intimidated by my distinguished male professor and the seemingly brilliant comments of male classmates. I remembered getting into a heated discussion about rape, only to find myself backed up against a wall by the comment, "You're not one of those feminists who hate men, are you?"

But I think the most vivid impression I have is of Homecoming/Winter Carnival/Spring Weekend two years ago (those big weekends, they all sort of blur together). I was dragging myself home from an Armstrong late-night, thinking only of peeling the contacts out of my eyes and collapsing into my bed at Morgan. Two upperclassmen were walking behind me, talking loudly, obviously a wee bit intoxicated. They fell silent as we passed Baxter and moved into the depths of darkness towards Route 2.

Then one of them said, a little too loudly, "Aren't you afraid, walking by yourself in the middle of the night in front of two guys you don't even know?"

Frankly, I hadn't been. In fact, somewhere around the Freshman Quad the thought had crossed my mind of how wonderful it was to go to a school where you didn't have to worry about things like that. Three minutes later, here I was gauging whether I could make it to Route 2 before these guys could catch me.

"No," I returned, all bravado. "Should I be?"

They practically fell over themselves with denials. Not at all. Absolutely not. Of course not.

The end of the story is that I crossed the street and entered the haven of my freshman entry while they continued down to Spring Street, probably in search of something as unthreatening as a pizza. I have no idea who they were, mostly because I was too terrified to turn around and look at them. Probably they were very nice people who never would have said such a thing in a sober condition, and who had never meant anything by it anyway.

I remember feeling angry over the next few days, when I realized that the episode had destroyed my feeling of security on campus. And not just in terms of getting mugged in dim Spring Street alleys. I was lucky in that those two men only verbalized their thoughts and did not go through with them. But when they looked at me, they saw not an average freshman on the way home from a party, but a body that they could take advantage of. I couldn't help but wonder if next time, thought might be translated into action.

Why, just because I was a woman, did I have to look at men with distrust? I hated the vulnerability, the helplessness. I hated feeling that my well-being depended on other people's suppression of their baser instincts. Williams has this way of making you want to be in control, but I had to face the fact that as a woman, I could potentially be very out of control of what happened to me. And who was responsible for this? Men here at Williams. Classmates. Potential friends.

I think that what this encounter made me realize is that passivity here is stupid. As women we excuse it because we attend a liberal, isolated, coeducational college where there really isn't anyone to argue with about feminism anyway. To a point that's true. There aren't many Williams males who would throw out the old "barefoot and pregnant" line in casual conversation anymore.

But there are men here, and maybe women, who don't hesitate to write unbelievably sexist comments on a display case as long as they don't have to use their names. There are men who don't hesitate to make threatening remarks to freshmen women when they've had a little too much to drink. I.e., sexism may not be cool, but there are a hell of a lot of people who still buy into it, even on our liberal haven in the Berkshires.

Other women here have other experiences. Maybe some women haven't encountered sexism to any considerable extent yet. But I contend that as long as there are women like me with stories like mine to relate -- as long as many women can sit down in front of a computer terminal and have something to write about when they think about sexism here -- then sexism does exist at Williams, and it is a problem, and no woman should let herself be apathetic about it.

'It's going to be a long haul'

A dim forecast for feminist issues under Bush

Valerie Hartouni is a Visiting Assistant Professor of Political Science at Williams. She is currently teaching "Introduction to Feminist Thought" and "The Politics of Bodies."

Questions by Dan Silverman

RECORD: How do you see the condition of the women's movement today?

HARTOUNI: The women's movement is incredibly diverse. It doesn't quite make sense to talk about a single women's movement. What usually gets counted as the women's movement, mainstream liberal feminism, lost its critical edge well over a decade ago. It more or less successfully challenged formal, legal barriers to women's entrance into public activity and with that pretty much exhausted its agenda. It has rallied on the abortion issue in the last year or so, but it's hardly at the forefront of political change and no longer seems to me to have much political presence.

RECORD: The U.S. Supreme Court will hear three abortion rights cases this year. Considering the recent Supreme Court ruling on the Missouri case and the Bush administration's feelings on the abortion issue, how do you see the future of the legality of abortion, government funding for abortions, and the states' rights for determining abortion laws?

HARTOUNI: These are pretty big questions. It's difficult to say. With the Missouri ruling the Court turned the issue back to the States. And contrary to popular expectation, I think, legislatures across the land have not moved to restrict abortion access with great speed or enthusiasm.

In fact, it appears that in several recent elections, candidates were voted into office largely dants in rape cases using the defense that the woman was provocatively dressed and "asking for it"?

HARTOUNI: Rape, I think, is taken more seriously today than it was, say, ten years ago, but I'm not sure that's saying a great deal. Convictions are still quite difficult to obtain. Misogynist assumptions persist and that's what the "she was asking for it" defense basically appeals to -- she was a bad girl, only bad girls are raped. We live in a society in which violence against women is condoned and in such a society sexual assault and sexual harassment are, in practice at least, still very much accommodated or denied.

RECORD: How do you see the future of lesbian issues, especially those concerning the definition of a "true family" and the adoption of children by lesbian couples?

HARTOUNI: Adoption agencies want to place children in what they consider a normal, healthy, conventional nuclear family situation. Leaving aside the question of whether this kind of family actually exists -- or if it does exist, whether it's health -- lesbian co-parenting hardly fits the mold. In our society, there continues to be a deep and pervasive belief that lesbians and, for that matter, gay men are deviants and that you can't entrust the well-being of children to such persons.

The fear is of course that lesbians and gay men will pervert, abuse, molest and otherwise corrupt children placed in their custody -- better on the basis of their "pro-choice" commitments -- an interesting, but not entirely surprising turn of events. When it comes right down to it, and this reading is not especially original, I do not think the American people will stand for recriminalization -- greater restrictions on middle term abortions, perhaps; greater regulation, maybe; but recriminalization, no.

As for how the administration really feels about abortion, who knows? Bush has equivocated throughout the last two decades on the issue. Still, he has some political debts and he has to make some effort to pay up where Reagan didn't or couldn't. His veto of the Boxer amendment which would have allowed federal funding for abortion in cases of rape and incest may be a down payment; he's big on down payments. But it may also have cost him. An administration which forces women, in many instances children, to bear children under such circumstances can hardly be regarded as "kinder" or "gentler."

RECORD: Where do you see the future of the issue of rape, and the recurrence of defen-seems to warehouse such kids, put them in foster homes than place them with lesbians and gays. It's plain garbage, but homophobia is alive and well. While definitions of what counts as a "true family" may be changing, attitudes towards same-sex relationships are not.

RECORD: What has happened to the ERA over the past few years?

HARTOUNI: A couple of years ago NOW recommitted itself to pushing for the Equal Rights Amendment. Once the immediate threat to abortion subsidies, we can expect NOW will probably attempt once again to generate support for the amendment.

I'm not convinced it's a particularly wise expenditure of political energies. What is an equal rights amendment? It's a formal declaration that women are equal to men, that gender isn't supposed to count when it comes to legal rights. Now, how do you actually legislate or enforce that? What do we expect will actually change if legal discourse is itself gendered? What concrete difference is a formal declaration actually going to make?

You can't eat a right, and it won't take care of your kids while you're working. Rather than fight for an Equal Rights Amendment, why not adequate day care, flex time or health insurance? Why not direct efforts toward changing the concrete conditions of women's lives?

RECORD: What do you think the possibilities are for government-funded child care in the future?

HARTOUNI: It's difficult to say. For the most part, we continue to think of day care as a private issue, a family issue, something people have to deal with themselves. Or we think of it as a welfare issue, something linked to large federal subsidies and poor, inept working women with lots of kids they can't take care of.

And then there was the assumption, certainly prevalent during the Reagan years, that women with children belonged in the home and were somehow shirking their maternal responsibilities, not to mention undermining the traditional family by entering the workforce. Women with gling, but they're committed. The United States really stands alone in its recalcitrance and I don't see the working out of similar policies situated very high on the Bush agenda. It's going to be a long haul.

RECORD: How would you grade the Bush Administration's work on women's issues so far?

HARTOUNI: How would I grade it? F minus.

RECORD: How do you feel Justice O'Connor has done in supporting woman's issues, especially the abortion issue?

HARTOUNI: People seem to assume that just because you have a woman in some position of power, she's going to be favorably predisposed toward women or women's issues. This assumption is just wrong. O'Connor is no champion of either women or women's issues.

But remember, she's a Supreme Court Judge and in principle, at least, she's supposed to be deciding cases on merit. As I read it, she more children are in the workforce -- over 50 percent of women with children under one work, and women's needs simply cannot be ignored.

Other industrialized countries have national policies promoting government subsidized child care arrangements. It's expensive, they're strug-or less sat the fence in the Webster decision. She was also the justice who issued a quite sobering warning: Roe v. Wade is on a collision course with itself. I hardly think she can be counted on to support abortion or any other issue related to women simply because she's female.

Shortage of feminist profs, tenured women

College struggles to balance gender ratios in the faculty

by Justin Smith

The college's hiring of minority professors has been publicly analyzed and criticized a great deal over the past two years. However, the numbers for female faculty have received little attention and are almost as critical.

"We lost approximately one-fifth of tenured women faculty as of the spring of last year, and of those one-quarter were very active in the Women's Studies program," Associate Professor of English Suzanne Graver said. Graver served as acting chair of the Women's Studies program last year.

"The area of greatest loss here has been in Division II. Right now we have only two tenured women in Division II," she said. Associate Professor of History Patricia Tracy, the third tenured female faculty member in Division II, is on leave this year. There are twelve tenured female faculty members in Division I and three in Division III. In contrast, there are 24 tenured male faculty members in Division I, 41 in Division II, and 20 in Division III.

"The college clearly has a problem both in recruiting good women faculty members and keeping them once they are here," said Assistant Professor of Political Science Kathryn Manzo.

In addition to the desirability of having a 50-50 gender ratio in the faculty, the loss of tenured faculty members like Rosemarie Tong and Wendy Brown has seriously harmed the Women Studies program.

The percentage of women on the Williams faculty has gradually increased over time and continues to increase, despite recent losses. "The number of women on the faculty was rising fairly rapidly in '85 and '86. Although the numbers have continued to increase, the percent of women on the faculty has seemed to level off," Reichert said.

Although the number of women faculty has fallen from 87 last year to 86 this year, Reichert noted that if visiting professors, part-time faculty and physical education instructors are excluded from total faculty, the number of women has actually increased to 51 or 25.8 percent of the total faculty for 1989-1990, up from 46 or 24.6 percent last year.

Despite the net increase, Reichert said the college is working hard to attract and retain women faculty. "We are reinvigorating our efforts to attract good women candidates. Things seem to be picking up a little bit but not in any way that would make me feel that we can rest on our laurels. Though it's not a bad record, we've got to push harder."

No change in plans

Reichert added that recent departures of tenured female faculty have not had a significant impact on the recruiting plans of the college. "I think I would feel the same way about the need to keep pushing even if they had not left."

However, Reichert acknowledged the special need to support the Women's Studies program. "The college has to make every effort it can to support that program and to provide it with the kind of stability and leadership it needs," Reichert said. "There are some very good people in the assistant professorial ranks, but we've got to keep our eye on the hiring of women in every community. There's no community of feminists around them," Manzo said. "If you bring them into an environment which is not conducive to them staying here, then they're not going to stay. It's not that the college doesn't make them feel welcome. I don't think that the college goes out of its way to attract them either."

Although Brown and Tong could not be reached for comment, their former colleagues at Williams were quick to emphasize that their departures did not signify an underlying problem in the intellectual atmosphere of Williams.

"These women just found jobs that fit their lives better than Williams," said Professor of Lynda Bundtzen, who chairs the Women's Studies department. "It was just a very individual thing for each of them."

Although particular female professors leave the college for personal reasons, the competition to retain professors is fierce and some handicaps inherent to the college may hinder the efforts of the administration to retain women faculty.

Graver said that Williams' geographical isolation is one factor that makes life inconvenient for some faculty members. This is especially true for professors trying to sustain long-distance commuting relationships.

"The college is not doing enough to make it easier for professors to have long weekends," Manzo said. "Allowance is not made for the fact that they have to commute. Certainly men have to commute too but I think there are more women than men who are in that situation."

The workload of being a professor at Williams also makes teaching here less attractive than at some other institutions, according to Hershtatter. Williams professors are generally paid less to teach more classes and to spend more time with students than professors at many other schools. There is also an increasing emphasis on contributing to publications.

Two for one

"You get two jobs for one salary," Bundtzen said.

Hershtatter said that female professors are further burdened by the task of guiding and counselling female students. "Many of us have rather heavy mentoring responsibilities."

Tracy, who is on leave this year, now chairs the Women's Studies program at Virginia Polytechnic. Bundtzen, who recently spoke with Tracy, said that Tracy teaches one class rather than two and can therefore devote more time to the Women's Studies program.

"She has a much more attractive position in terms of workload," Bundtzen said. "She feels that she has time to administer the program in Women's Studies and is quite eagerly trying to bring in grant money to supplement the program."

Similarly, Bundtzen said that Brown's new position as director of the Feminist Studies Research Institute at the University of California at Santa Cruz allows greater flexibility than being a faculty member at Williams. Brown has a lighter course load and graduate students assist her in research. "She can combine her own research interests with her teaching interests," Bundtzen said.

Because of the disadvantages of a position at Williams, the college may have to offer higher salaries to feminist professors in order to retain them. "In the past the college has been very clear that it has within its discretionary power to offer higher salaries to valuable professors, people who really add to the diversity of the college in important ways," Bundtzen said.

Rape at Williams

by Marlam Naficy

You are in your dorm room with your date. Your date has walked you home after a late-night party and you have both had a couple of drinks. Your date starts making sexual suggestions and physical contact, and you flirt in response, thinking that he or she is only joking around. But as it turns out, your date is very serious.

Though it sounds dramatic, this scenario is one that may occur frequently at Williams. Health Coordinator Donna Denelli-Hess and others agree that the majority of rapes at Williams are probably acquaintance or date rapes, and that this is one reason that rape at Williams is underreported.

Peer Health Coordinator Pam Volpe '91 estimates that about ten victims come forward every year at Williams, and that for every one reported rape, there are ten that actually occur.

Dean Sheila Spear, on the other hand, said that only one rape case has been reported to the dean's office in the six and a half years she has been here.

She added that she has heard rumors of other victims who have gone to the North Adams Regional Hospital for treatment but have never reported the incident to the Deans Office. "The incidence is low," she said, "but not as low as that one report indicates."

Volpe said that the underestimation of the incidence was made clear to her last spring. After a round of entry talks on date rape, Peer Health counselors were approached by five to ten people who said that they had been raped by an acquaintance.

"Not a taxi service"

Rape by a stranger can also occur, and the deans' office has encouraged students who are worried about their personal safety to call Security for an after-dark ride or escort. However,

William April '90 demonstrates moves against would-be attackers to freshman women. These self-defense classes were sponsored by the deans' office. (Taylor)

Jenks denied that the conversation ever took place, even though the story was corroborated by a witness. "Ransom would never say that - that's not part of Ransom's repertoire," Jenks said. "[Moffitt] just doesn't know Ransom

"Victims feel a lot of guilt and a lot of shame. They feel like they've been singled out for a reason. They don't realize that in most cases the rapist has decided to rape someone and they were just there," Linda Puth '91, a counselor for the Rape Crisis Center in Pittsfield, said.

Part of the reason it is so difficult to obtain accurate figures on rape at Williams is that rape itself is hard to define, according to Darrow. Rape can include sexual intercourse that one partner has misgivings about.

Volpe, for example, cited instances in which male students have come to her for counselling because they felt that "they had been taken advantage of by women while intoxicated" and thereby coerced into having sex. "They were seriously upset about it," she said.

What Denelli-Hess and Spear emphasized is that reporting rape does not necessarily mean

How serious of a problem is date rape at Williams?

	Very serious	Somewhat serious	Not a problem
Female	36%	58%	14%
Male	19%	51%	30%

there is some question as to what Security perceives its escort duties to be.

A student in the Williams graduate program in art history, Isabelle Moffitt, said that she went to the Security Office to ask Ransom Jenks, Director of Security, if she could call Security for a late-night ride from Sawyer Library to the Center for Development Economics, where she lives. Jenks said no.

"We are not a taxi service," Moffitt said he told her. She said Jenks did not mention the escort service or any other ways for her to get home safely. Her account of the incident was corroborated by a witness who asked not to be identified.

"He spoke to me in a condescending way -- I felt like he was thinking, 'Oh, this stupid girl,'" she said.

When asked for his version of the incident,

Jenks."

"That shouldn't be happening," Dean of Freshmen William Darrow said about Jenks' reported answer to Moffitt's request. Dean of the College Stephen Fix declined to comment when told of the incident.

After a rape

Victims that report rape at Williams usually follow a certain procedure, according to Denelli-Hess. They are transported by Security to the Health Center and given medical treatment and, if they want it, counselling by Denelli-Hess.

If the victim wants to press charges, the procedure is somewhat different. The victim is taken to North Adams Regional Hospital and is given tests which can later be used as evidence against the rapist. Additional support and counselling is available at the deans' office.

The option of working through the college disciplinary system to punish the offender is an alternative to pressing charges. The victim can report the case to the deans' office, which would then take disciplinary measures against the rapist without the victim ever having to confront him or her.

The deans might decide to use the Disciplinary Committee in the decision-making process, as it did during the 1982-1983 school year in a rape case that precipitated the first substantive college-wide discussion on rape, according to Spear. The Disciplinary Committee would also be involved in a rape case if the offender appealed the decision of the deans.

"We want people to know that [the school disciplinary system] is a middle-of-the-road alternative," Rob Illig '91, chair of the Honor Committee, said. "The advantage of the Disciplinary Committee as opposed to the court system is that it's confidential -- and there's no incentive to bring up a victim's former sex life or to embarrass the victim in any way. We're more enlightened than that."

Growing consciousness

Date rape has been a topic of growing concern for the deans' office. "Date-rape began to impinge on our consciousnesses three or four years ago," Spear said. The deans' office sponsored a panel discussion on the topic at that time.

Since then Spear has researched the topic and brought different publications and a video to campus to make them available to students. "Part of the pressure to hire a health coordinator came out of the concern about [date-rape]," she said.

Along the same lines, Darrow recently sponsored a series of self-defense classes for freshman women by William April '90. In addition, entry talks about date rape were scheduled as required events for freshmen during Freshman Days for the first time this year. The talks involved viewing a movie filmed by Cornell University students and a discussion afterwards led by junior advisers.

In its efforts at raising consciousness about date rape, Peer Health encourages students to watch out for their friends if they've been drinking and to be careful about how much they drink themselves. Alcohol usually heightens the gap in communication between two people, according to Volpe. She said that the number of rapes tends to rise on big drinking weekends like Homecoming and Winter Carnival.

pressing charges against the rapist. They both said that they are concerned that victims may not be receiving the counselling and care they need because they are afraid of having to confront the rapist.

Peer Health also advises men to ask women if they are sure they want to proceed with intercourse, and to take the response "no" as no. "[Being asked if they are sure] is something that any woman would appreciate," Volpe said.

Campus abortion groups get Ephs involved

by Tom Dupree

Two student groups, Williams Against Abortion on Demand and Williams for Choice, have been formed in the last year to represent the concerns of both sides of the controversial topic. The ideological confrontations between these groups have often been intense.

Williams Against Abortion on Demand (WAAD) consists of approximately fifteen members, whose purpose, according to Co-President Tara Hurley '91, is not only to promote anti-abortion views, but also to lend "intellectual legitimacy to the other side; to provide a forum in which an alternate opinion may be presented." The group is opposed to all abortions, except when the life of the mother is endangered.

Co-President Russ Day '91 said, "Being against abortion carries an anti-intellectual tag. When I first came here, the attitude was that you can't be intelligent and opposed to abortion."

"We're very small in membership right now," Hurley said of WAAD. "Although we have some supporters, they sense a general pro-choice sentiment on campus and therefore might be somewhat hesitant about joining."

According to Hurley, simply making people aware of the group's presence on campus is desirable. WAAD has tried to accomplish this goal by sending out mailings on the present and future status of abortion, which generated responses from both sides of the issue.

Sponsoring speakers

The group's main fall project was arranging for columnist Nat Hentoff to speak at Williams on November 15. Hentoff's talk is entitled, "How a Jewish Atheist Became a Pro-lifer and Remained a Jewish Atheist."

The group hopes to sponsor additional speakers in the spring. "What attracted us to Nat Hentoff was that he's very liberal, and he's not coming from a religious standpoint," Hurley said. "We're trying to get people from different backgrounds." She mentioned the possibility of WAAD bringing a speaker from Feminists for Life to campus as another example of the liberal pro-life viewpoint.

Another project in the works involves working on a section on abortion alternatives for the revised Williams Guideto Health and Sex. "We've been contacting centers that advertise for alternatives to abortion, making sure they're legitimate and that they're not religiously affiliated," Hurley said.

Although Hurley expressed disapproval of the current policies of Health Services at Williams regarding abortion, she acknowledged that the situation was out of her and the college's control.

"It would be very hard for the college not to offer all the legal choices," she said. "It's not as if there's a huge majority of students crying out against it. Still, if there were any way possible we could halt just one abortion, we would."

She said that Health Services does not advocate any particular route for pregnant students to take. "I would hope, though, that in the future, the government is so reformed that Health Services is no longer allowed to present abortion as an option."

The other side

Williams for Choice, unlike WAAD, has no shortage of members, numbering over 100 students at last count. Lisa Kaestner '91, a founding member of the group, said their goal is to "educate people on the issues from a pro-choice perspective, to get people thinking and encourage discussion."

The group has sent out an all-campus mailing, sponsored petition drives and set up a display in Baxter this year. Forty-six Williams for Choice members travelled to Washington, D.C. last Sunday to participate in a march at the Lincoln Memorial. The rally was titled "Mobilization for Women's Lives" and was expected to be the largest march ever in Washington.

Later in the year, Williams for Choice members hope to sponsor a speaker from the National Abortion Rights Action League (NARAL) and campaign for pro-choice candidates during the 1990 Congressional elections. Another possibility is another debate with WAAD during Winter Study.

According to Kaestner, the group also feels that it has been a target for vandalism. Earlier this year, posters placed by the group advocating a boycott of Domino's Pizza were torn down. "Within two weeks, they were all down," Kaestner said.

Throughout the entire process, complete confidentiality is assured; no one, including students, deans and parents, is allowed access to the medical records.

Denelli-Hess refused to give an exact number of Williams students who have had abortions performed through Health Services, but she speculated that the amount is similar to other schools of comparable size. "I would assume we're pretty much the same," she said. "I have no sense that we're any different."

Counselling

Health Services strongly recommends that the student confer with a psychological counselor before and after an abortion. Barbara Joslyn, one such counselor, said, "I feel like my goal in relating to a student who is contemplating whether or not to have an abortion is to find out what she wants, and make sure that she is comfortable with the decision."

"The students seem quite appreciative. I think the service works very well. Students are re-

"It definitely seemed directed. Other posters that were next to ours were still there. We're not pointing our finger at anyone. We don't know if it's a person or a group," she said.

Kaestner added that a Williams for Choice representative spoke with Assistant Dean Andrew Hernandez about the matter, but that no action was taken. "We would have liked some recognition that a problem exists," she said. "The college did nothing."

Kaestner also expressed her group's belief that WCFM was reluctant last year to run a carte announcing a pro-choice march, but played a carte championing a pro-life viewpoint.

Both campus groups took part in a debate on American Pulse, a television program run by Williams students. Mariam Naficy '91 represented Williams for Choice, while Day spoke for WAAD. The show aired last Tuesday.

lieved and reassured that there's someone to talk to. Some students use it quite extensively. One meeting sometimes develops into a series of sessions."

Peer Health is another organization that plays a strong, non-political role in counseling pregnant students and helping them to arrange appointments with gynecologists.

Pam Volpe '91, a Peer Health coordinator, speculated on why some students contact Peer Health instead of Health Services. "They feel more comfortable talking with other students. We'll do research on their behalf, and we'll stick with them through the entire process."

"Peer Health is more listening and talking things through. If we think [the situation] is beyond our abilities, we'll refer them to Health Services."

Volpe said that less than half of the pregnant students who contact Peer Health stay in touch with the group until the process is complete.

"Sometimes they come back to us after it's over just to talk. Students should remember that we're there and we're willing to help."

OPINION: Two sides of a bitter issue

Against abortion on demand

by Tara Hurley and Russ Day

Williams Against Abortion on Demand

A certain assumption concerning the issue of abortion is already implicit by its placement in a supplement devoted to women's issues. We would like ultimately to question the presumptions involved in framing the abortion issue in this context. Is abortion exclusively, or at the very least primarily, a woman's concern? Of course, in order to answer this question, one must first define what exactly is involved in the debate over abortion.

It is clear that proponents of legal abortion on demand found their arguments upon a notion of liberty and free choice. Their slogans, their chants, their banners all proclaim that the pro-

The fact that one's mother does not love or want one in no way precludes one's humanity or right to live.

We, and as far as we know, other opponents of abortion, do not reject this nation's belief in free choice. One certainly should have the choice as to where to live and whom to marry. But one just as certainly does not have the right to steal another's property, to inflict bodily harm upon one's adversaries, to bludgeon one's grandmother with an axe. One might wish to choose any one of these actions but society must never sanction them.

Therefore, it seems obvious that free choice is not an unlimited principle. Societies and governments may, in the interest of public order and the protection of its citizens, restrain the exercise of free choice. So, it would seem that if one can prove that abortion is the taking of innocent human life, then it is within the purview of a government to limit choice in order to protect that life.

In order for one to determine whether or not abortion is the taking of a human life, one must first establish when life begins. One may answer this question from a variety of approaches: biological, philosophical, or religious. In formulating a public policy, one must seek an answer to this question which is undeniable, incontrovertible.

Philosophers and theologians argue and debate endlessly over the issues of soul and personhood in order to determine when life becomes meaningful or worthy of value. It seems evident that no consensus will ever be reached through either of these disciplines. Therefore, in order to attain an answer to the question, "When does life begin?", one must turn to the discipline which may provide us with an objective, scientific response, that of biology.

How then does the scientific community answer this question? There is very little doubt or debate concerning this issue. Once the egg is fertilized by the sperm, a separate and distinct human entity has been formed. From that point onward, all the fertilized egg physically needs to become an eighteen-year-old freshman at Williams College is time, shelter and nutrition, and these three factors are all we need to become wrinkled alums.

One of the primary illustrative arguments of those who defend abortion on demand is that a fertilized egg, or an embryo, or a fetus is not human, just as an acorn is not an oak tree. Such an argument appears valid until one realizes that an acorn is in fact an oak tree. An acorn is an oak tree in its initial stage of development, as an adolescent, or yes, a fetus, is merely a human being in one of its stages of development.

We stated before that all a fetus needs to become an adult is time, shelter and nutrition. Similarly, if given the proper time, shelter and nutrition, the acorn will become an adult oak tree. One could then argue that while we would not think twice before stepping on and thus destroying an acorn, we would never compare this action to arbitrarily chopping down a full-grown oak tree. In the same way, why should we have a concern for the human equivalent of an acorn?

Before we may answer this question, it would seem we would have to determine that which makes us value an oak tree as opposed to that which makes us value humanity. It seems obvious that there is a distinction. We would step on that acorn because we only value oak trees once they have achieved a certain level of utility, of environmental significance.

We do not use the same standard to judge human beings. For example, if we were to use a utilitarian notion of human value, we would have to exterminate all those human beings who detract more from society than they contribute, such as the mentally retarded and those in nursing homes. We do not do this, however, because our society has a notion of humanity which acknowledges the inherent worth of every human being, regardless of their usefulness or their societal function.

cially it seems, those here at Williams, is that if abortion becomes illegal, women will be forced to seek "back alley" abortions or will perform them on themselves with, for example, coat hangers. No one wants to see women die. But is the fact that women will seek illegal abortions and may injure themselves or be injured in the process a justification for the direct killing of innocent human life?

For example, let us imagine a desperately poor young man in the inner city. His poverty drives

by Mariam Naficy
Williams For Choice

In a recent mailing to the college community, Williams Against Abortion on Demand claimed that the pro-choice movement is overestimating the ramifications of the Webster v. Reproductive Health Services case recently decided by the Supreme Court:

"The National Organization for Women and the National Abortion Rights Action League have propounded the theory that [the Webster] decision sounds the death knell for the legal procurement of abortion in the United States. While a smart public relations move on their part, this analysis is profoundly incorrect."

Why would any group announce, in uninspiring language, that its fight has not been completely successful? The strategy, or rather the public relations move, is simple. By attempting to convince the pro-choice majority that they have little to worry about, anti-choicers hope to discourage pro-choice action.

After all, political analysts believe, it was pro-choice complacency which enabled the anti-choice movement to gain considerable ground in the 16 years since Roe v. Wade was decided. If pro-choicers take the right to abortion for granted, gains made in the 1970s can be taken away before they have a chance to react.

Now, setbacks from the Webster case have reinvigorated the pro-choice movement and shrunk the breathing room that anti-choicers have enjoyed for years. However, the threat to reproductive rights still exists. Though WAAD may say that Roe v. Wade is far from being overturned, the federal government, especially President George Bush, is gearing up for war on Choice.

Bush recently vetoed a Congressional bill which would have provided federal funding to poor women for abortions in circumstances of rape and incest. In addition, he vetoed the

Meanwhile, the conservatives already on the Court could limit abortion rights even further. At least one Justice, Antonin Scalia, has expressed a wish to do so. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor wrote in her Webster opinion that "there will be time enough to re-examine Roe, and to do so carefully"; indeed, the Supreme Court will be considering three more abortion cases this term which may enable Court conservatives to further restrict access to abortion.

WAAD has declared that pro-choicers are overreacting to the Webster decision. It stated in the same mailing, however, that states now "have the autonomy to determine for themselves whether or not they will fund abortion or allow abortion in their facilities" because of the decision. It is hard to imagine overreacting to Webster's results: in Missouri, the home of the Webster case, 97 percent of abortions are carried out at clinics and hospitals which depend to some degree on public funds. The consequences of this recent case could be devastating.

To make matters worse, 37 other states show anti-choice tendencies, according to Newsweek. These states could very well use the Webster decision to make it almost impossible to obtain legal abortions.

What exactly is at stake in these decisions? Backed neither by medical consensus nor by scientific evidence, the concept that life begins at conception is a belief, not a fact. Imposing on the nation a particular religious belief of when life begins, as Justice John Paul Stevens wrote in his Webster dissent, would violate the First Amendment's prohibition against the establishment of state religion.

For example, the dominant position of the Jewish faith, as cited by the Supreme Court, is that life does not begin until birth. Imposing the idea that life begins at conception on the American Jewish community would therefore violate its religious freedom.

It is important to note that the pro-choice position does not impose one view on all; instead, it allows each individual to come to his/her own personal decision regarding the issue, based on his/her religious and moral beliefs. The distinction is clear: pro-choice does not mean pro-abortion.

The challenge now, therefore, is to capitalize on the popular majority of the pro-choice movement. According to a recent Newsweek poll, a majority of Americans support the right to have an abortion. One step pro-choicers can take is to vote against anti-choice candidates running for office -- to use their votes as political weapons.

The call to arms has already had a telling effect in the political arena: the abortion issue has been pivotal in the current Virginia governor's race, for example, and in other political contests across the country.

The most important thing that a pro-chooser can do, however, is to resist complacency and act upon the knowledge that the right to choose is in serious jeopardy. We cannot let the anti-choice movement gain further ground, and we cannot besitlen any longer. Time is running out.

Williams offers resources to pregnant students

by Tom Dupree

Abortion is one of the hottest topics in national politics. Recent legislation at both the federal and state levels has served only to sharpen the divides between pro-life and pro-choice activists. People everywhere are taking a stand on one side or another, and the Williams College campus is no exception.

One organization which prides itself on rising above political issues, however, is the Williams College Health Services.

Health Services, located in the Infirmary on Latham Street, is oblivious to the political and legal issues in which the word "abortion" is wrapped. Its concern is to deal with the here and now: abortions on the Williams campus.

Although abortions are not performed at the Infirmary, Health Services fulfills two related purposes -- helping the student reach a decision concerning whether or not to have an abortion; and, if a student wishes to have an abortion performed locally, helping the student to contact and make an appointment with an area gynecologist.

6/ The Insider November 14, 1989

The 18-24 age group has the highest abortion rate in the nation. Earlier this year, Director of Health Dr. James Corkins stated that between eight and fifteen female students at Williams become pregnant each year, and the majority choose to terminate their pregnancy.

According to Health Educator Donna Denelli-Hess, Health Services often talks at length with pregnant women who are considering abortions. "Sometimes students come in thinking they have their minds made up, when in fact it isn't," she said. "We don't just let them go off [without discussing the decision]."

She added, however, that the ultimate decision resides with the student. "It's entirely up to her which route to take," she said.

Abortions arranged through Health Services are performed either at the Williamstown Medical Associates, or at the doctor's building adjacent to the North Adams Hospital. Students often return directly to the Infirmary after the procedure is completed because of related minor physical or emotional difficulties, and many return for a two-week checkup to ensure there "Should I feel guilty for being an upper-class income, white male?"

 "You should be if your identity includes being sexist."

"All the posters on this display would have us think that a woman is either a feminist (good) or a conservative, selfish, insensitive, out-of-touch bitch. I am independent, ambitious, and proud of being female. But I will not be called a feminist, for reasons well represented in this display."

"According to the deans: 10 rapes occurred last year that were reported on the Williams campus. They estimate 100-150 occurred but were not reported."

"Superfluous message board is worth a crock of shit for any real 'social' change. Get off your ass if you want something, and please stop moaning about oppression. Respond, but with action."

"Most feminists would benefit from a rape!"

"What if she agrees to sex and changes her mind afterward, accusing her lover of rape? Why is that rape? How many of the reported rapes are of the above type?"

"I read a statistic that said that 30% of the women that say 'no' to sex, actually mean yes. In other words, no can mean yes, by this statistic."

"If she says yes it's not as much fun."

"What if they say yes, but still feel violated?"

Stress, change affect eating behavior at Williams

by Ellen Drought

Eating disorders, which are reaching epidemic levels on college campuses nationwide, are a serious problem at Williams as well. And while college-age women everywhere are particularly susceptible to eating disorders, students and counselors say that some aspects of the Williams environment may exacerbate the problem here.

"The percentage of students here who are diagnosable as having one of the disorders is small," Barbara Joslyn, a psychological counselor at Williams, said. "But many women students here have some behavior that is similar to the actual disorders."

She explained that each disorder has a strict medical definition, but that more simplified definitions are more in keeping with what is seen at Williams.

"[An anorexic] is someone who is trying to be as thin as possible, way beyond what is appropriate," she said. "A bulimic is someone who overeats and then purges, either through vomiting, diuretics or excess exercise." She added that compulsive overeating is a third category of eating disorders that is often overlooked, especially on college campuses.

Because eating disorders are such private concerns, and many students who have them don't seek counseling, it is difficult to approximate how widespread the problem is at Williams.

"We only have statistics on those who come

Skiping meals

One student who exhibited compulsive eating behavior while at Williams said, "I notice that kind of behavior in other people now, people who start skipping meals. I'm ultrasensitive to it. It's scary how much a part of this campus it is.

"A lot of people never reach the phase where an eating disorder is obvious. I know many people who have a terrible eating disorder. They don't eat for a week, then they eat a lot. And they don't look any different -- either very thin or overweight. This weird pattern of eating is in itself a disorder."

Joslyn agreed that a common form of eating disorders at Williams involves compulsive cycles of eating. "In order to reach an ideal, women eat less than is comfortable. They diet or eat less than they physiologically need. You eat something that is superhealthy and low in calories, and the stuff that appeals to you you just look at.

"Then the student starts feeling deprived, and tension develops. It's unbearable to live day to day always under-eating. So the student begins to binge. They think, 'I haven't eaten a dessert in a few weeks; I think I'll have one. Boy, that tasted good, I think I'll have another.' This leads to tremendous guilt, and to another diet.

Joslyn said this cycle can take place on a daily basis. "You don't eat breakfast and lunch, then you binge at dinner. Or you skip breakfast and lunch, have a salad and a diet soda at dinner, and eat a pizza at night. This undercuts the non-eating of the day and leads to guilt."

Assistant Professor of Psychology Jaine Strauss is currently doing research in the field of eating disorders. She said that students she has talked to say there is a competitive aspect to eating at Williams.

"A group will be sitting at Baxter, and

'There's a pressure here to conform and be perfect -- the whole beautiful person image.'

[to Psych Services]," Joslyn said. "But I would say a large proportion of Williams students develop concerns about their eating."

She added that bulimia is the more prevalent of eating disorders at Williams, since anorexia is more common among teenage girls.

Students and counselors agree that there is a stress on athletics at Williams that may contribute to some of the eating problems on campus.

"It's such an athletic school," the above student said. "There's a pressure here to conform and be perfect -- the whole beautiful person image. It's a pressure school in that way."

"There's a narrow standard of what a good body looks like at Williams," Strauss said. "There's so much stress at Williams, and food is a wonderful way to deal with stress. So students use food to deal with stress, and want to look like the ideal body, which leads to more stress. So they do 4,000 hours worth of exercise."

Strauss sees the athletic focus on campus as double edged. "Many students use exercise to burn off stress in productive ways. But there's a point where exercise becomes all-consuming."

Concrete achievements

The correlation between compulsive exercise and eating disorders is high, according to Strauss. "It's gratifying to have concrete measures of your achievement. In this case it's a certain number of miles run and the numbers on the scale getting smaller."

Students and counselors also trace some of the cause of eating disorders to the general life changes that occur when a student goes to college. For example, Strauss emphasized the new role of sexual intimacy in leading to concerns about eating.

"Here you have opportunities you didn't have in high school. You try to look a certain way to have the ideal other; you think by having the perfect body, your social life will be just perfect."

"Freshman year was highly stressful for me: not being with my friends from high school, meeting new people, having a harder work load," the student said. "It's such a change, and you want everything to be perfect."

"There is the 'freshman 15' -- people do over-eat," Joslyn said. "In addition to the anxiety, there's the social business of sitting around the dining hall for extended periods, being with friends, eating the second dessert."

She also explained that some women actually lose weight their freshman year. "With the anxiety of gaining 15 pounds they become counter-phobic. They are supercareful about eating and become slightly anorexic."

Dining Services

Students said that messages sent out by Dining Services can add to the problem. "I think the someone says, 'I'm going to get some ice cream. Does anyone else want some?' There's a chain reaction, everyone else wants some too. They think, 'She's going to break down, so I will too,' but they didn't want to be the first."

"I was really surprised that on the back of a dining hall menu, they included a list of ways to avoid gaining the freshman fifteen," a junior advisor said. "Eating disorders and problems with body image are prevalent here already, and I thought that that really sent out the wrong message -- especially to freshmen who may perceive certain extra pressures to fit in and be 'successful Williams students.'"

Joslyn also explained that some of the students with eating concerns at Williams exhibited such behavior before coming to college. "There are some students who have quite severe disorders before getting to Williams; some have even been hospitalized. They bring that to Williams with the hope that being in the different environment will cure them."

A larger societal trend is also seen to be critical for understanding the problems women have with their body image. "You have to put [eating disorders] in the context of living in a society where 20 million Americans are dieting; 56% of women aged 25-54 are dieting," Joslyn said. "It's the era of 'thin is in.'"

Strauss addressed the unique societal standards set for women's bodies, and cited a recent study which found that 80 percent of fourth-grade girls were on a diet. "So at a very young age, girls are told to worry about their weight."

Ways to get help

Given the extent of eating concerns at Williams, what resources does the college offer to help?

"Our staff offers individual therapy about any range of problems; concerns about eating can be the prime reason for coming in, or in the context of other problems. There's also a group for women students, open to anybody," Joslyn said.

"I think our service is pretty well used; there are ebbs and flows... Sometimes the problem affects suitemates and room-mates who come in and talk about it. It takes some time for the student to decide if they want help."

"Can people get better without help? Absolutely," Strauss said. "But what helps people get better fastest is often to seek help with someone. For the more serious problems it's important for a professional to be consulted, because of the medical problems involved."

Strauss also stressed the solitary nature of eating disorders. "It's often a woman struggling on her own, isolated. It's helpful to talk about what she is going through, because it feels so shameful to not be able to maintain the perfect figure without resorting to diuretics or vomiting."

"If you recognize the problem, it makes it so much easier on yourself," the student said. She ended up going to some sessions of the eating concerns group. "It takes a lot of guts to talk about it. You see that it's such a big thing at Williams; you realize it's not just you."

Studies indicate class participation differs according to gender, but students disagree

by Sallie Han

Williams has based its educational philosophy on coeducation since women were first admitted to the college in 1971. However, studies conducted in the past decade indicate that coeducation may not mean equal education for men and women.

An article by Director of the Harvard-Danforth Center Video Lab Catherine Krupnick which was published in The Journal of the Harvard-Danforth Center in May 1985 reported how gender affected the quality of teaching and learning at Harvard College. The study was designed to explore differences between male and female students' classroom participation and what effect the teacher's gender had on class participation.

It was found that in the predominant classroom circumstance (male students in the majority and a male professor), male students talk much longer than females, even up to two-and-a-half times longer. In classes led by female professors, female students spoke almost three times longer than in classes led by male professors.

It was also found that participation came in "gender runs." Long periods of predominantly male talk was followed by short bursts of all female talk. While men talk at length (and are less likely to be interrupted) in a "contest-like" style, women will speak less frequently and more briefly and tend to overlap each other's comments in a "rotating" participatory style.

Williams dynamics

Does the Williams classroom reflect these dynamics? Students and professors shared different experiences of class participation.

"In three of my four classes, mostly men do all the talking and answer questions," Alyce Toohey '92 said. "Whenever someone asks a question it's usually a guy."

How vocal do you consider yourself in the classroom?

"In my French 109 class, females do most of the talking. But there are more female than male students in that class," she said.

"I would say that men participate more," Al Funk '92 said. He added that because his potential major was political economics, which is perceived as a male-dominated area of studies, most of his classes had more male than female students. "My classes usually have a 70:30 ratio. I'm not sure about the number, but it seems heavily leaning toward men."

"I think women talk less in science classes, but both men and women talk less in science classes. Nobody really talks. There's no real participation or at least, not really any class discussion, in science classes," Patricia Lee '92, a potential chemistry major, said.

Most students said that generally they did not find that women participated less than men in their classes.

"I don't think there's a difference between how much men and how much women participate in class," Peter Sunew '92 said. "I don't think women talk any less."

What profs say

Several professors said that not only did they find that the level of women's participation in class was no lower than men's, but that often it was higher.

"The cliché is that women talk less than men. That has not generally been so in my experience," Assistant Professor of History Thomas Kohut said.

He said that out of 17 students, the three women who are in his History 301 class are the most active participants in that class. Conversely, he added, his History 343 class has more female than male students but the male students tend to dominate discussion in that class.

"I think history has a lot of men majors, more than women majors. But it has never been my impression that women speak any less than men."

Assistant Professor of Economics Diane Macunovich teaches two senior seminars and said that out of a total of 23 students in both classes, only six are women.

"They do not participate less than the men," she said. "On average I would say they participate more than the men in the class."

"I think what I've found in my experience here is consistent with the observation that, in jors talk even if they're not in the majority."

"It's hard to say whether men participate more than women because usually there are more men than women in the classes I teach," Professor of Astronomy and department chair Karen Kwitter said. "The observation that men participate more than women is true but you have to consider that there are more men than women. Naturally you'll hear more male voices."

"There's always a student in every class who always has something to say and is the first one to say it," Kwitter said. "In one of my classes now, it happens to be a male. I've had classes in was significant was that overall participation, by both males and females, is greater in classes led by female professors than in classes led by male professors.

Williams students, however, overwhelmingly said they thought that the gender of the professor made no difference in terms of classroom participation.

Toohey said that she did tend to participate more in classes led by female professors. However, she said, "I don't think it has anything to do with whether it's a female or a male prof. Generally the male profs here are older. They the past where it was a female. It really depends on the student's individual personality type."

Encouraging women majors

Several professors were concerned with the low numbers of women majors in certain departments. The sciences and the economics and history departments have historically been perceived as "male" departments.

"In recent years the English department, the majors, have become heavily female. It has come to the point that two-thirds of our majors are women," Swann said. "That's a real change from five years ago. There are also proportionately more women faculty in this department than in others."

"When I first got here I think there was a problem with a lot of silent women English majors. That is not as much a problem now," Swann said. "In other departments it is probably still a problem and the faculty should be concerned if a department is not attracting women majors."

"Not only are there fewer women than men in the major, but fewer women than we have had before are coming in economics," Macunovich said. "It's something the economics department is concerned about. We don't know if this is a continuing trend but we'd like to see what we can do about it and encouraging women to study economics."

"I find that my classes are overwhelmingly composed of men," Kwitter agreed. She said that the last woman to graduate as an astronomy major was in 1987.

Female professors

Another study undertaken by a professor at Vassar in 1984 examined gender dynamics. Three sessions each of 60 different 100- and 200-level classes distributed among the arts, social sciences and natural sciences were observed. These courses varied in number of students enrolled and were taught by male and female professors, tenured and untenured.

It was found that, at Vassar, males generally participate more than females, but that the difference was not statistically significant. What have a tendency to be kind of intimidating, I think, to anyone. I have talked more in classes with female profs, but my female profs are younger. I feel more comfortable; they're easier to relate to."

"I haven't really participated in classes with female profs, but that was because of the class, not the prof," Jon Steffy '92 said. "I don't think it really makes a difference."

A role model

"It may be true that because I'm a woman, the women in my class may feel more comfortable," Kwitter said. "I guess they could see me as a role model as a woman working in the sciences."

Another female professor in the sciences said that of the four seniors who have worked with her on their research project, three were women. "Perhaps it was a mentoring thing, where the women felt more comfortable working with me. But perhaps it was simply the specific field I work in that attracted them."

"I don't think it is so much the gender of the teacher as it is the make-up of the class," Swann said. "I think when there are more men, men tend to dominate."

"In the classes I've taught over the last couple of years I've had more women and they participate," she said. Swann teaches two courses in which the majority of students are women: Women's Studies 101 and English 219, Literature by Women.

"I do tend to get interested in women who don't talk in class but I don't know if I in any overt way treat them differently," she said. "I do tend to be conscious of and attentive to them."

"I have a colleague at Amherst and they have a new woman professor in the department. They claim that since she has come to the department, the women are more interested and participating more. That may be, but I think that's more a surface change," Professor of Geology Markes Johnson said. "I don't think that gender is what counts. I think that the dynamics of the prof are what really counts in the long run."

Women come to Williams in '71

by Stephanie Jones

Imagine if many of the female roles in college productions were played by faculty wives. If your Homecoming date were published in the Record. Or if a handbook entitled "Where the Girls Are" was a campus best-seller. Sound impossible? All of the above were features of Williams life before coeducation.

Williams first admitted women as freshmen in September 1971. According to Professor of Environmental Studies Benjamin Labaree, who was a dean in the late 1960s, this was largely in response to student and faculty opinion. According to a 1969 WCFM poll, 89 percent of the students were in favor of coeducation.

"You could almost say that it was a natural outgrowth of our particular history and the change in the residential system," Professor of History John Hyde, another dean of the college at the time, said. "Williams had already gone through the real period of self-evaluation and stress and strain, so the addition of women was not that dramatic."

Mount Hope Farm

Williams first began examining the possibility of coeducation in the mid-1960s. One of the early ideas was a coordinate school to be established on Mt. Hope Farm.

This idea did not get very far, Labaree said, because it involved too much duplication and expense. In May 1969, the Committee on Coordinate Education and Related Questions recommended that the college begin accepting women. In the same year reports from a student committee and from the faculty also recommended coeducation. In September 1969, the trustees voted to admit women into the Class of 1975. Thomas Parker '69, now acting director of admissions, attributed much of the change to President John Sawyer. "Jack Sawyer remade Williams College in many ways. Admitting women was just one of the things he accomplished."

"The college made the decision at the same time as it decided to expand the student body, which was a financial decision. [It decided] that the additional 600 students would be women,"

'The men were territorial about the best houses, and there was a perennial discussion about bathrooms.'

said Assistant to the President Nancy McIntire, who came to Williams in 1970 to help with the transition.

Mission Park had already been planned at the time and opened in 1971, so overcrowding was less of a problem at Williams than at other colleges making similar transitions.

"I know we spent a lot of time trying to decide if women would experience different types of courses, and if we could satisfy them," Labaree said. Women were expected to take more classes in underenrolled departments, which would have eased the transition but which in fact did not happen.

Aiding the transition

Labaree said that decisions that aided the transition were the abolition of fraternities in 1968, the Twelve College exchange established in 1969-70, the acceptance of a large number of women transfers, and the abolition of parietal hours (visiting hours for the opposite sex). The Class of '74 contained about 90 women in 1971-

72, half transfers and half on exchange.

The college grew from 1200 to 1800 in the first few years. However, since women were only supposed to fill the extra places, the ratio in each class remained 2-1. A 1975 report by the Committee on Coeducation recommended that this be changed to a sex-blind admissions policy, which was later adopted.

"There were strains having to do with social life and being one of a few women in a predominately male environment," McIntire said. The college attempted to spread the women throughout all the housing groups.

"What that meant for those few women was that they were really in the minority, and were not always so cordially greeted."

Labaree said that the adjustments that the college had to deal with not only included establishing dormitories and physical facilities for women, but finding a way to counsel women students. "Very few faculty or administrators had experience with women students or with those men students who might find the addition of women students a problem," he said. "It's remarkable how quickly we adjusted...I think it was more of a problem in anticipation than in actuality."

The college made an arrangement with the health service to establish medical care for women, McIntire said. The women's gym was opened in 1970, but because of a lack of coaches some sports had to be played in the wrong season.

Few female faculty

"One of the things that had not really been thought through was the hiring of women on the faculty and staff," she said. In 1971, eight faculty members were female.

After coeducation, the school attempted to attract and hire more females, but this situation was more difficult to change than the student body, Hyde said.

From the beginning, housing was a mixture of coed and single-sex. Freshmen were divided into single sex entries, and the row houses consisted of single-sex houses within a coed group. Some male houses moved as a group into the new dorms, Mission Park and Dodd, and their former houses became all-female.

The Greylock houses could be coed by blocks of rooms. Individual row houses began to become coed in the mid-70s.

"The men were rather territorial about what they considered the better houses, and there was a perennial discussion about bathrooms," McIntire said. "Fitch House was notorious for some male students who were unpleasant to women members."

Connie Sheehy '75, now manager of office systems in admissions, said that some of the men wore "Coeds Go Home" t-shirts and continued to bring in dates from women's colleges.

Rope-a-dope is an example of the type of incident that sometimes occurred, she said. A group of students, each with a bottle of hard liquor, tied themselves together in Greylock quad. If one drank, all had to drink. If one went to the bathroom, all went to the bathroom, in the place where they were standing. They gave soliloquies on raunchy topics in front of the

'The study of dead white men'

Women's Studies takes a different perspective

by Keith Hedlund

Professor of English Lynda Bundtzen took the reigns of the Women's Studies program this year, and had a surprise in store for her right off the bat.

"Coming back to chairing the program after having been on a leave for three years, I was very pleased during the freshman orientation period by the number of students who showed up at the [division] meetings to ask questions about Women's Studies. No one used to show up."

Bundtzen had better mark her calendar for next year, because Women's Studies is a discipline on the move. Since its inception in 1983, the program has been growing in influence and popularity both in and outside the Williams classroom.

The current Women's Studies information packet defines the field as "the study of women, past and present, in all fields of inquiry." It says that proponents of the discipline have two goals, to create "major programs and areas of concentration" and to "integrate the materials and methods of Women's Studies into the traditional disciplines."

The concentration

Williams offers a five-course concentration, not a major, in Women's Studies. There are currently 50 concentrators on campus, and the 101 course, "Introduction to Feminist Thought," has become one of the most popular courses on campus among both men and women. "I think there is a growing perception of it as a course that everyone should take at some point in their four years at Williams," Bundtzen said. "It helped expand my awareness of some of the issues involved in feminism, including specific issues such as rape and prostitution, and it introduced me to new modes of analysis, questions of power, personal versus political life," said Jay Steinman '91, who took the course last year. "I found it incredibly valuable in terms of teaching new ways of thinking about the nature of politics and social relations."

However, Elizabeth Baez '90, a concentrator in women's studies, pointed out the limitations of the course as an introduction. "There is only so much you can discuss in one semester. I feel there are so many issues to deal with. You only brush the surface of a lot of them."

Contrary to what one might think, men comprise a fair share of the 101 enrollment. "A lot of the men in the 101 class are seniors," Baez said. "I think you have some men who come to campus not thinking about women's issues, and they see a lot of lectures and a lot of women performing in the arts, and after three years they are interested enough to deal with gender issues."

Sense of solidarity

"There is a certain sense of solidarity when you're in a Women's Studies class instead of being in a course where things are looked at only from a male perspective," Hilary Johnson

Professor Lynda Bundtzen is the new chair of the Women's Studies department, founded in 1983. (Isackson)

'91, another concentrator, said.

"When women are brought into the center of analysis, as a woman it helps you to hope that women can be brought to the center of the political or economic realm also," she continued.

"It's an alienating feeling to always read about only men in courses. All these things sort of say, 'Women do exist in history.'"

"There has been a growing respect for the kind of work done in Women's Studies," Bundtzen said. "There is this growing body of feminist scholarship and theory. People have a growing sense that this is where exciting work is being done, and therefore in order to keep up in their own field, [they say to themselves], not only should I, but I want to pay heed."

Women's Studies as an academic discipline grew out of the American feminist movement in the 1960's. Bundtzen said the first courses were history and English courses designed not only to retrieve lost female authors and figures, but often lost characters; there were many "Images of Women in..." courses.

Role models

Some of the early courses, she said, were also often naive. "They were concerned with finding good role models, which is not what literature is really about."

Although various courses focusing on women's issues or women's perspective had been offered at Williams since women were first admitted to the college in 1970-71, Women's Studies did not become an official concentration here until 1983.

"Williams didn't bring Women's Studies to Williams," Bundtzen said. "Women's Studies at Williams grew from within by the commitment of a lot of women faculty. There was a group of women who were interested in Women's Studies, and we began to discuss how we could create a program that would work the program into already firmly ensconced programs."

Political roots

Bundtzen said that one of the problems for many of the women involved in teaching Women's Studies is "that what originally urged them to teach Women's Studies...was an urgency that grew out of the women's movement. By now it is such a well-established discipline that some of the newer people don't think about it in political terms. But for some of the older women, we have to keep reminding ourselves that Women's Studies was part of a movement. It did have political and feminist roots."

Bundtzen added that in that political context,

'We have to keep reminding ourselves that Women's Studies was part of a movement. It did have feminist and political roots.'

Not just academic

"It isn't just academic. It's made a difference in a lot of women's lives," she maintained. "What Women's Studies wants to do, I think, is to send people out with a perspective that will want to change things in the world."

Rebecca Buchanan, a senior concentrator, said she doesn't think the political nature of the program makes the courses too ideological. "The faculty who teach the courses tend to be feminists, but there is a lot of division within feminism so that it is not monolithic."

Possibility of a major

A few colleges in the U.S. offer a major in Women's Studies, and many students have been calling for the same at Williams. Bundtzen said one of the reasons a lot of students would like to see the program grow into a major is that they "want to belong to a more cohesive group of students. It's hard to do that when the program itself is so diffuse."

Students concentrating in Women's Studies must take the 101 course, the 401 senior seminar, and three of certain designated electives from at least two departments. Because the courses are distributed throughout so many departments, the concentrators don't get the "sense of belonging" common to majors of a field until they get to the 401 seminar. Then, she said, they feel like saying to the other students they find in the seminar, "Where have you been?"

"You can be a concentrator and not even know who the other concentrators are," Buchanan said.

Nevertheless, Bundtzen doesn't see a major forming in the immediate future. "Much depends on the next two or three years," she said. "If we continue to have the large number of concentrators that we've had...and we don't lose any more key people who teach in the program, then I think we will continue to survive. The question is can we go beyond surviving to thriving."

Faculty shortage

"The problem is that we've lost a lot of senior women who were important contributors to the program -- [Professors] Rosie Tong, Pat Tracy, Wendy Brown -- and as a result of [the workload reduction], we are going to have even more difficulties coming up with the right number of electives, so right now I feel that the program simply has to get through hard times."

But the program is still concerned with that "sense of belonging," Bundtzen said. With that in mind, the program has just initiated a series of brown bag lunches for the concentrators.

Another plan for the future is establishing a third required course to deal with cross-cultural issues. "We haven't paid enough attention cross-culturally with the way women are constructed," Bundtzen said. "Things which may be theoretically true here might not be true in the Bahamas."

Such an addition could make the program even more valuable to someone like Steinman, who said that Women's Studies is "especially important in a place like Williams, where the educational charter is by default mostly devoted to the study of dead white men."

Alumni Society President graduated before coeducation

Katherine Berry '57 worked around the rules

by Stephanie Jones

Although Williams did not become coeducational until 1971-72, the first women to graduate from Williams did not graduate in the 1970s, but in the 1950s.

Katherine Berry, who has been the president of the Society of Alumni for the past year, graduated from Williams in 1957. She came to Williams in her junior year, after marrying a Williams student.

"I had been a student at Vassar my first two years. My husband and I met on a blind date our freshman year, and we were married before my sophomore year," she said. As Vassar required that students spend their senior year on campus, she was not able to complete her degree there but decided to continue studying at Williams.

A major in economics

Since World War II, Williams had a policy of allowing women to take classes. "I was the first woman to come along who wanted to take the full schedule," Berry said. She took all of the required courses and completed a major in economics. Dean Robert Brooks took it on himself to see that she received a certificate, which had never been done before, she said.

"He said it was not fair that I had gone to two of the country's finest colleges and would not have anything to show for it," she said.

Although Berry was the only woman on campus, except for a few town residents who were auditing courses, she said she did not feel out of place.

"I was made to feel very much at home by both the faculty and the students. I was treated as an intellectual equal. I was treated as one of the guys."

Enlightened point of view

"In comparison with other colleges Williams had an enlightened point of view.... I was very grateful to Williams for allowing me to take classes and complete my education." She said that this is one of the reasons she is such an active volunteer for the college.

Berry is currently the senior vice president of United Way of Tri-State in New York City. She is also the first woman to be the president of the Society of Alumni. She has three daughters, and her middle daughter, Elizabeth, graduated in the class of 1982.

After Williams became coeducational, Berry and three other women who had completed a Williams degree called the school and were awarded diplomas.

"There was no problem," Berry said. "Craig Lewis, the director of alumni wrote a letter congratulating me and asking what class I wanted to be in. Of course I said the class I graduated with, 1957, even though I actually received my degree in the 1970s."

Dialogue on women's issues must be maintained

Becky Teed '90 is the leader of the Feminist Alliance. She was interviewed for the Insider by Rajesh Swaminathan.

RECORD: How exclusive do you feel the Feminist Alliance is as a mouthpiece for women and their concerns?

TEED: It's not really exclusive at all. The Cauldron is a publication which is really good for voicing opinions because mixes so many different sort of communication: art, essays, stories, poems. And it gets circulated to everyone on campus. We don't really circulate a newsletter or anything. All you see of us are the posters, the discussion groups.

Women's Studies is a very, very important group. Their agenda and ours are very much the same and they want to communicate a lot of the same things we do: women, how valuable is the experience they should celebrate, they should share, and [with which] they should empower themselves.

RECORD: Do you feel that there is sexism on this campus? How should this situation be dealt with?

TEED: Oh, yes. I'd say the first thing is support, and that's where the idea of a women's support group comes in. If she's taking a lot of flak, she can come to an Feminist Alliance meeting and meet a bunch of other people who share her feeling that she doesn't deserve this garbage, that she shouldn't take it for granted.

RECORD: Do you feel that men on this campus are aware of these concerns?

TEED: I don't know if most of them are. I know that a lot of them are. A lot of men know that they shouldn't browbeat women in class, that they shouldn't expect women to defer to them...or in the case of acquaintance rape, that they owe them sex. Men can be aware of these things and still, if there's no incentive to give up the privilege, some people will still hold on to it, even though they know they are doing the wrong thing."

RECORD: What could you say about the gender dynamics on campus in general?

TEED: I think the problem is that a lot of people don't think about what's going on and that's why consciousness-raising is so helpful and dialogue is so helpful. It makes you think about things that you just assumed were natural. You always assumed that women backed down in an argument, then you hear 'no, that's not true, here's an example otherwise.'

RECORD: Do you think men can be feminists?

TEED: I think a lot of men are feminists, not only men who are involved with the Alliance, but people who go through day to day life. They can be passive feminists in that they don't ever sexually harass someone, or treat people in sexist ways. Or they're people who stand up and say, 'Look, Joe-or-whatever, what you're doing is not nice,' who empower their female companions in the dorm or whatever.

RECORD: Are you satisfied with the way the various women's groups on campus have been fostering dialogue on women's issues?

TEED: No, not really. On one hand, across three-and-a-quarter years, I have seen a lot of screwups; and on the other, I think that discourse on these issues should not be limited to these groups. I think it's up to every man and woman on this campus to deal with this and to be willing to discuss it and to do something about it.

RECORD: What kind of a stance is the Feminist Alliance taking on abortion? Are you leaving it to the other abortion-issue groups on campus or do you have anything planned specifically?

TEED: I think this year I've avoided making

'I think you can survive on this campus if you're very careful. You cannot take anything for granted. You must lock your door, you must remember to call security.'

abortion part of our agenda, because Williams-for-Choice is a very big group. [But] I would love to see more dialogue on abortion on this campus. Somebody put up a comment on the feminism board, 'Can I be pro-life and still be a feminist?' and that's a really interesting question. I personally think that abortion is a really important issue of feminism, but as I said, there's lots of room for dialogue.

RECORD: How do you feel about the sabotage against the efforts of campus abortion groups in the past two years? Why do you think the campus is so intolerant and what do feel the administration should do about this?

TEED: I'm really bothered by the sabotage I've seen. On our board, a few of the most defensive comments disappeared and I understand that Williams-for-Choice had their very mellow posters ripped down.

That really, really, bothers me, because if there is no possibility for dialogue, then the Feminist Alliance is in big trouble; that's what we're into. I'd like to see the administration deal with it fairly seriously. I don't know if it's up there with stealing people's wallets, but I do think some sort of action should be taken.

RECORD: Have you any idea why the campus is so intolerant, especially since most students are supposed to be middle-of-the-road liberals?

TEED: I think the problem is that most students, being middle-of-the-road liberals, tear down things they perceive as going too far, whether this be feminism, or Republicanism, or environmentalism, what have you. I think the problem with intolerance is that we're here from the ages of 18 to 22. It's a really nervous age. People are walking out of what, in many cases, is a calm background into this big melting pot of ideas and fairly heated debate and just don't want to deal with it.

RECORD: Do you think the college is doing enough to make the campus secure for women, both physically and mentally?

TEED: Physically, I've got to say that the locks on the doors, if they don't work, you can call B&G and get them fixed. They were slow about putting up lighting, but it's up and that's a good thing. Security is available; I think that's really good.

Physically, I think you can survive on this campus if you're very careful; that's the problem. You've got to know what the safeguards are and how to use them. You cannot take anything for granted. You must lock your door, you must remember to call security. It's not safe in a normal sense.

In a mental sense, women are given a lot of encouragement to stand up for themselves, to respect themselves, to respect their experiences. But when there are students who want to browbeat them, I don't know what the college could do to discourage this without completely quashing free speech, which would be possibly the worst thing that could happen to us.

The Feminist Alliance tries to meet women's needs

by Rajesh Swaminathan

The Feminist Alliance has long been one of the most visible proponents of women's issues at Williams. Founded originally as a means to articulate the concerns of Williams women, it has now greatly expanded its role.

Rebecca Teed '90, head of the Feminist Alliance, said the Alliance serves both as a means to foster campus discussion on women's issues, as well as a support group for women.

"I would say it is intended to be and has the potential to be both. But the exact agenda depends on what people want at the time. This year, we have had a lot of people who want to start doing things on campus; in previous years, it has been much more of a support group."

The Alliance currently has 15 to 20 members, according to Teed. "I'd say we've had moderate success; most of our members are upper-classmen. This is not one of the organizations that freshmen rush to join right away, but some of our most active people are freshmen."

Teed said that the Alliance also counts two men as active members. "They're very active participants and they hold certain positions. I know one of the men in question is concerned with the idea of a general humanist project and he is very conscious of his position as a man in the Alliance...His perspective is a good one. We have a number of men and they do speak up."

Not all-encompassing

She admitted that many men and women on campus would support the Alliance's goals and term themselves feminists, but are not members of the organization.

"In a lot of cases, it's a lack of time, and that at Williams is really easy to understand. And in many other cases, maybe they are unconcerned with the way someone's handling an agenda. For example, I don't submit to the Cauldron, because I don't write very well. There are a lot of ways to be a feminist, as many ways as there are feminists, and these groups can't really encompass all of them."

She said that as a support group, the Alliance has served as a clearinghouse for concerns and complaints. Sexual harassment is an important issue this year for Alliance members. Teed said that a rapport has been established with the Dean's Office with regard to problems of sexual harassment.

"There was in fact a serious problem in communication. Students were not telling the deans, and the students...didn't know that they could tell the deans."

Teed said that an equally important function of the Alliance lies in promoting discussion of women's issues. The two Baxter Hall displays on date rape and feminism this year were a means of promoting that kind of discussion.

"They hate men!"

"Feminism is one of those things that inspires a reaction without thought. 'Feminism? Oh no, they hate men! I'm not one of them!' and so on and so forth," Teed said. "It's a stereotype."

"By putting up that board, making people think about it, I think it's very important to shake up stereotypes. And if women are willing to say, 'Yes, I am a feminist,' they'll be willing to not put up with a lot of nonsense that they might otherwise have to take for granted."

Teed said that the date rape display was trying to convey a more urgent message. "We wanted students to realize what happens; that's very important because then they would take it seriously and they would protect themselves or protect each other."

"We also generated comments, and it was very interesting to see what people thought of the problem. The comments I got were a lot more sincere and thoughtful than I thought they would be; I was afraid we would get a whole bunch of jokes and it would be left at that."

Future plans for the year include coffee-houses on different women's issues, sponsoring speakers, and a women's party.

"The idea is that you have a party and invite only women," Teed said of the last. "It's very interesting to attend because women aren't going as dates of men, they aren't going to pick up men. They're there basically to enjoy themselves and to enjoy each other's company, which is a very, very important ideal of the Feminist Alliance."

Class participation

Teed identified women's participation in class discussions as another issue the Alliance may focus on in the future (see related story, page 11). The group is organizing material for a possible future display on the subject.

	Female	Male
Very successful	5%	11%
Moderately successful	68%	43%
Could do better	27%	46%

She said the Alliance interacts with and represents the lesbian community on campus as much as possible. "I know a fair number of lesbians on campus and many of them are not members of the Feminist Alliance. Most lesbians I know are feminists, but there are so many ways to deal with the feminist agenda on campus. Women's Studies and the Cauldron being two places you can go, that there are a lot of reasons they'd want to go somewhere else. The Feminist Alliance has contained and always will contain many members of the lesbian community and represents them."

The Alliance's commitment to women's issues transcends the Williams community, according to Teed. Last year, for instance, the group ran buses to a pro-choice march in Washington, D.C.

'Their methods have been radical but it has been necessary to [get] people's attention.'

Student comments

Student perception of the organization continues to be mixed. A number of the Williams community actively support the objectives of the organization and have endorsed even the radical methods employed in the past to highlight diverse issues.

"I think that they have done a good job so far. Several of their methods have been radical but it has been almost necessary to call people's attention to these issues in general," one student said. "I don't think people would have reacted as strongly if different methods had been used."

However, other students were not so sympathetic. A student who requested that his name be withheld from print dismissed the efforts of the organization in two words: "Penis envy."

"I think it's important that the Feminist Alliance raises the questions it does on issues such as abortion, rape, etc.," John Baur '92 said. "But [it] is rather extreme in its beliefs; I think it's unfortunate that they don't include more men in their discussions. I believe that because they don't hear the other side, they can't form rational opinions."

However, Teed said that much of the work and purpose of the Alliance is dependent on an atmosphere conducive to intelligent discussion. Above all, she stressed the need for tolerance and recognition of other viewpoints as crucial to the efforts of the Alliance.

She said, "If there is no possibility for dialogue, then the Feminist Alliance is in big trouble; that's what we're into. If you let people tear down posters for the Observer, for [Williams-for-]Choice, for anything, then the purpose of Williams is really defeated. We're here so we can talk."

prenatal judgment that a child will be abused, neglected, or in some way lead an unproductive, unfulfilling life? The fact that one's mother does not love one or does not want one in no way lessens or precludes one's humanity and right to live.

As demonstrated above, it is evident that abortion is the taking of innocent and defenseless human life. If this is the case, as we contend, abortion is not merely a women's issue. It is an issue that must concern all of humanity. There are many conditions under which women may feel compelled to have an abortion.

But in a society which claims as its foundation a belief in the inherent value of a human life, the taking of that human life may never be considered as a solution to any problem in that society. While our society values the right to choose, when that right comes into conflict with our most basic right, the right to our very lives, the right to life must prevail. It is for this reason that we believe that the barbaric solution of abortion on demand must stop.

Transition to coeducation was relatively smooth for Williams students women's windows. This went on all night.

However, Sheehy said that such incidents did not ruin her experience of Williams. "There is change that is mandated and change that works out on its own. The changes that had to occur were in student attitudes. I don't remember feeling that it was oppressive. The class has a very strong and loyal group of alumni and I don't think this would be the case if they had had a negative experience."

Assistant Director of Alumni Relations Wendy Hopkins '72 said she came to Williams as a junior from Connecticut College on the Twelve College exchange for 1970-71 and ended up camping out in front of the dean's office in an attempt to transfer.

Hopkins was admitted in January 1971. Shortly afterwards, many of the other exchange students petitioned to stay. In her senior year, Hopkins was a junior advisor.

Not a focus

She said that coeducation was not really a focus of attention by the students. "I don't remember ever talking about it, and you'd think it would be the topic."

One problem was the attitudes of some of the students, Hopkins said. Some of the houses had the reputation of being vehemently against coeducation, and she said she heard of incidents such as one woman being punched.

"My professors were all very supportive...I was universally well-treated. I had one religion course where the professor was thrilled to have women in his class," she said. "As a group I think we were quieter. I know I was very meek."

"I think because there was such a small number of women you had more men friends," Sheehy said. She added that she found the men in her class, who had come to Williams expecting a coed school, to be accepting, but had problems with men in other classes.

"The upperclass men, a lot of them did not make the adjustment so well. There were things that were tolerated by the administration that would never be tolerated now. That may be a function of an increased awareness of women's issues and that women now make up nearly half of the student body."

Sheehy said that the college really seemed to make an effort to adjust to female students.

Demand for salad

"The food was terrible. Basically they just had meat and potatoes. The women said, we've got to have some salad. By sophomore year they put out some lettuce and that was our salad bar."

"If there are any negatives I look back on, it is that we didn't have any mentors," she concluded. "I think we were invisible in a lot of leadership positions."

"Over time the most obvious change is in the social life of the college, which became campus-oriented," Hyde said. Before coeducation, non-academic life centered around house parties, big weekends, and road tripping, he said. Coeducation made social life both more continuous and more relaxed.

"The place is just better in every way," Parker said. "In thinking back, the focus on people's desire for Williams to be coed was primarily social, but I think the intellectual life has been transformed in a way never anticipated."

him to attempt armed robbery at a bank. In the process of the robbery, a bank employee shoots and kills this young man. While we may understand his motives and feel anguish at such a waste of human life, is the logical result of these feelings the legalization of armed robbery? Such logic is exactly the same as that which underlies the "coat hanger" argument for legal abortion, and is as logically indefensible.

Women cannot truly achieve equality with men until they can control their reproductive processes to the same extent that men can. So say some as a defense of abortion on demand. It is a biological fact that, for better or worse, women have the capacity for child-bearing. This fact may indeed inhibit some women from certain opportunities to in some way further their position in life.

But does this inhibition justify the taking of innocent human life? When comparing the right of a woman not to be inhibited by the presence of a human being in her body with the right of the human being to its very life, it seems undeniable that the right to life must take precedence.

So what about those cases in which the woman has absolutely no control over her reproductive Athlete speaks on anorexia

by Sogin Kim

According to the American College Health Association, one in eight college women suffer from anorexia or bulimia. Last Monday night, more than 60 people squeezed into room two of Griffin Hall to learn more about this problem from Nancy Gengler, a professional squash player and recovered bulimic.

Gengler, who counsels patients suffering from anorexia and bulimia at Gracie Square Hospital in New York City, spoke to an audience that included several Williams coaches, Health Educator Donna Denelli-Hess and Barbara Jocelyn of Health Services.

According to Mary Leming '90, the large turn-out, about twice the size of the one for the panel discussion held in the spring of 1988 in Lawrence Hall, seems to reflect the increasing prevalence of eating disorders. Eating disorders are reaching epidemic proportions, with the national rate as high as 12 percent in young people in the age range 16-21, according to the American College Health Association.

Gengler stressed recovery and approaches that friends can take in efforts to help bulimics and anorexics. "Often, for bulimics and anorexics, the self-image is so bruised that it's hard to believe anyone cares. Ask her what you can to help her. You'd be surprised. People know what helps them and what doesn't," Gengler said.

Professional squash player Nancy Gengler discussed her experiences with anorexia and bulimia, both as a sufferer and a counselor, last Monday night. (Thomas)

As a 21-year-old bulimic in 1977, Gengler said she moved through the binge-purge cycle of obsession with food at a time when both anorexia and bulimia were misunderstood by health professionals and the community at large. "Coming home one night, I found that my mother had put a lock on the refrigerator door; that wasn't helpful. Other people were constantly offering me food; that wasn't helpful, either. The first time I told a doctor about my peculiar habit was in 1974. The blood vessels were broken in and around my eyes, my knuckles were seared from putting the fingers down my throat to throw up, and my ankles were swollen from water retention. He prescribed sleep medication," Gengler said.

She stressed that although at the denial stage of the diseases, friends face anger and rejection, by showing concern, friends can "plant a seed so that the next time they might be more receptive." "In the long run, it is worse not to say anything. It can be seen as evidence of not caring," she said.

A Record interview

Pran discusses Cambodia, hopes and fears for the future

Dith Pran, the Cambodian photojournalist whose experiences under the Khmer Rouge was the subject of the film The Killing Fields, came to Williams Nov. 8. He was interviewed later by Record news assistant Rajesh Swaminathan.

RECORD: How accurate is The Killing Fields as a portrayal of your experiences?

PRAN: It has some [parts] that don't represent me. But if you talk about Khmer Rouge and the Cambodian life in the film, it is really accurate, but the whole thing is not my story alone. The Hollywood also is in there too, like they want to tell the world, even if you are a child, you still could get killed when you escape. So that's why when I left, I didn't bring the children, the child, with me; but I served before the Khmer Rouge soft-liner, like you saw. But when I escape, I didn't get map, I didn't bring the child. I escaped in a group of twelve people; two were killed from the land mine.

RECORD: How instrumental was Sydney Schanberg in [helping you] leave Thailand for the United States?

PRAN: I didn't spend much time in the camp because Sydney did all the paperwork for me; [he had] already told Americans [with the Immigration and Naturalization Service] that if this guy survive, get this guy out, you should bring him to United States to reunite with my family. Because my family left before, with the American Embassy, like you saw in the movie, in that final evacuation. So Sydney really work hard to get all the paperwork ready for me. I cross the border on the 3rd, Sydney come to meet me on the 9th, 11th we left the camp. And [then] on the 19th we left Bangkok. Why we had to stay in Bangkok for that one week? We got inguinal, vaccination, you know, checkup, and we got what you call swearing in. It was red tape.

RECORD: Several titles of the movie

[have alleged] that the relationship between you and Schanberg, as portrayed in the film, was insulting to you as an individual, because it was very paternalistic.

PRAN: Yeah, you know there is no way you can make movie completely the same as what we are. We were really caring, we love each other, and we become brothers. Even when we went to Cambodia this time, he went there too. And he really likes Cambodian people; he spent almost three months there. And I am a Cambodian and I only spent one week. He went last summer too; he just came around.

RECORD: What constituted the re-education program of the Pol Pot regime?

PRAN: What they do is some kind of punishment, for people from the city. If you can escape from the execution, you could die from the starvation, from the forced labor camp, from the disease. They brainwash you every night, don't forget they force you to work at night too, under the light of the stars, under the light of the moon. And then sometimes, they don't have any jobs so they bring around and you sit under the tree. They keep telling you all kind of things, or they have some kind of new project. Or they tell you about Khmer Rouge regime, all kind of things. All things belong to Khmer Rouge, you don't worry. You don't own anything, you have no right to keep your kid. That's nice, no child abuse. But they separate you; you have to work, they separate you [from your] kid. And you don't worry about your kid...they take care of your kid...until the age of eight. They say children belong to Angkor, you just work.

RECORD: You returned to Cambodia recently. Could you tell us a little more about what you saw?

PRAN: The current government is really reformed. Reform for me is not like America, but compared to Khmer Rouge, is much different. People can make business, people can own houses, land, people can go to school, to temple, people can travel; but different from the free world that you have to tell them, you have to have paperwork say where you are going, you let them know... but compared to communist we went through, is much very soft right now?

RECORD: Would you approve of the Hun Sen [the Vietnamese-installed leader of Cambodia] regime, then?

PRAN: I would say that Hun Sen is less evil for Cambodian people to choose. People don't really like him one hundred percent, but among all factions, I say we have to choose Hun Sen because first, he control more territory; second, Hun Sen is getting more reformed even though he still communist. To me, they trust Hun Sen more than opposition.

RECORD: Why do you prefer Hun Sen over Sihanouk's return to power?

PRAN: Because I know that Sihanouk cannot come back to the power. Because Hun Sen will not allow Sihanouk to become a real leader like before, because Hun Sen's [government] is not a weak government. They [the people] accept Sihanouk because [he] is not Khmer Rouge, because [he] is never communist. And they want Sihanouk because they want to put pressure that Sihanouk have to be returned to Cambodia. But I do not believe that Hun Sen going to let Sihanouk be a strong leader any more.

I prefer to see Sihanouk change himself, because he is not like Sihanouk before 1970. Because, he believe in China for so long, he is afraid to do something against China, and that is why he wants Khmer Rouge with him. My question is why does Sihanouk want the Khmer Rouge with him? Everybody know Khmer Rouge is criminal. I can say Sihanouk wants

Div III sees rising costs, private grants

by Sallie Han

In the fight to attract faculty to the academic sciences, colleges and universities have been making much more money available to the sciences in recent years. For the Williams College Division Three departments, this has meant increased funding for research as well as the skyrocketing importance of grants from private foundations and government agencies.

According to Professor of Physics and Director of the Bronfman Science Center Stuart Crampton, five years ago about $35,000 was spent in start-up funds, which are used for the purchase of equipment for research. In 1987, start-up funds totaled $160,000.

"The reason why we're trying to find more start-up funds is that we will lose prospective faculty to schools we would like to be compared to and even to schools we would be surprised to be compared to," Crampton said.

"Compared to other departments [where scholarship is equally important] the situation in the sciences is a little different. The equipment and materials are, in general, more expensive. Also, once research is started, it is absolutely essential to keep it going during the year."

More money for research

"There has definitely been a marked rise in the money that the college makes available for research," Professor of Physics and department chair Ballard

Pierce said. "There is a rising recognition that if you want to have good people here, who want to do research, you have to afford it. Williams is still not doing as well as some other colleges similar in size."

Professor of Chemistry and department chair Lawrence Kaplan added, "The amount put in to start-up is much larger than it was a few years ago. It used to be in the range of a few thousands [per person]. Now it's in the range of tens of thousands."

"The amount had been falling very far behind what other schools that are like Williams were offering. It had not even been keeping up with inflation. In order to attract good people it does require some more money."

And this money comes mostly from grants. According to the Treasurer of the College's report, in the fiscal year 1984 the total amount in research grants received from private foundations was $98,041. In the fiscal year 1989, that number was $747,916.

The total amount in research grants received from government funding agencies was $181,297 in 1984. That number was $941,937 in 1989. These figures include overhead.

There are different types of grants available to colleges and universities: grants from private foundations and from government granting agencies. Not are all

The Williams Record

How sweet it is!

Williams students have been criticized more than once for not having a sufficient quantity or quality of school spirit. The words to the chorus of "The Mountains" are only slightly more familiar than those to the third verse of the National Anthem, and class cheers have been exiled to the dusty cellar of forgotten tradition.

But don't tell that to the nearly 14,000 fans at last weekend's Homecoming victory over Amherst. For even if the majority of the crowd was unable to sing "Yard by Yard," they certainly made the Purple Valley ring with their cheers when Amherst quarterback Steve Bishop lost his grip on the pigskin and handed victory to the Ephs. As the final seconds ticked off the clock, the same fans once disparaged for their apathy rose en masse from their seats and hurdled the restraining barriers, storming onto the muddy turf of Weston Field.

The Game, however, was more than just The Fumble. There was a sense of history in the making as Williams achieved its first perfect 8-0 record. The New York Times ran two sizeable articles in its sports section, and Sports Illustrated reportedly has an article in the works. How curious to see the national media expressing an interest in the success of Williams' athletics instead of the size of its endowment or the range of its SAT scores.

The intense spirit of Williams students was visible all over campus last weekend. From the rugby teams' mass field at Brooks-Rogers Friday night, students turned out in droves to cheer one another on to glory. Saturday night was a well-deserved opportunity for celebration, for the players, for the performers and for everyone who clapped and cheered.

Best of all, it was good, clean fun. The Infantry reported that no students checked in on Saturday night, and the town police log showed no incidents involving Williams students. Those who think school spirit is lacking at Williams must have been out of town last weekend. With all due apologies to Mark Twain, reports of its dearth have been greatly exaggerated.

Letters

Treatment of Hernandez was unfair

To the editor:

I am writing this letter because I do not believe the function of the Williams Record should be to create news, but rather to report it. Last week's edition of the Record had a story entitled "Hernandez urges discussion of RA system." One had to read to the very end of the article to realize that Hernandez was by no means flawless. One would not think the fact that the Dean of Housing is doing his job would be front page news.

The Record, though, made it front page news by devoting most of the article to rejecting, rather than evaluating, an alternative system. The purpose of the article was not to generate discussion on the housing system, but rather to convince readers that Hernandez is doing a bad job and is a threat to Williams. It is difficult to be convinced that he is a threat, though, for all he is advocating is that people be open-minded. He has no intention of proposing a radical change in the housing system; he says, to quote from the final paragraph of the Record article, "I'm just saying, 'Hey, check it out.' When you go visit a friend in another school, find out what they think about RAs."

What could possibly be so awful about considering alternatives? Why is it considered news that the Dean of Housing is being open-minded about housing systems? Why does the Record attempt to portray Hernandez in such a negative light? It is difficult for me to believe that the Record feels threatened by the fact that the Dean of Housing, who "[thinks] 99 percent of the current housing arrangement works," has thoughts about ways housing could be improved. The story of Hernandez's feelings about housing was not a news story; it was a story created to generate bad feelings toward him. The Record editorial, entitled "Hernandez is wrong about RAs," was also devoted to the effort to create anti-Hernandez sentiment. I would almost consider it humorous that the Record had so little to write about that it chooses to write about a story of its own creation. It is not funny, though, because there is a person, Andy Hernandez, who is being truly hurt by the Record's unwarranted wrath.

The Record loses its credibility when it attempts to abuse its power. I begin to wonder what other stories that I have read in the Record were written with the intention of harming someone's career. I hope that in the future the Record will not allow itself to be the forum for slanderous journalism.

Hillary K. Johnson '91

Editor's Note: Neither the news story nor the editorial was intended to attack Dean Hernandez personally. The story offered an exposition of his views, drawn from an extensive interview with Hernandez himself, followed by a number of students' reactions to the ideas. The editorial expressed the consensus of the Record's editorial board that a system of residential advisors would not be workable at Williams. We do not agree with his idea, but we bear him no grudge for doing his job.

Movements are political, not economic

To the editor:

The opening of the East German frontier will long be remembered as a history-making event, the final, tangible proof that the cold war is over. The response from the White House has been less than inspiring, however. The wait-and-see attitude currently being taken by President Bush, while understandably cautious, seems lifeless during a period of such intense change.

Meanwhile, Vice President Quayle, irrelevant as ever, speaks of the expanding Soviet expansionist threat. It is necessary, amidst the excitement of the last several weeks, for our nation's leaders to evaluate the significance of recent events and chart a sensible course, while there is still an opening for the changes to be exploited in positive ways. The old cold-war rhetoric is obsolete, and we need leadership with courage and vision. The incredible sequence of events now transpiring in East Germany, as well as the recent reforms in Poland and Hungary, will undoubtedly be heralded as proof of the triumph of capitalism and the beginning of the end of socialism. The moves away from Soviet domination being made by East European regimes are being seen in primarily economic terms, as opening up now-stagnant economies to market forces.

However, these people's movements are first and foremost movements of independence, not movements toward western capitalist economic policies. They address the political reasons for the stagnation of their societies. Though their governments are willingly accepting much-needed aid packages, the aid is dependent on political reforms, not particular economic policies. East Germans are realizing that the solution to their problems lies not in emigrating, or in aligning their economy to the west, but in regaining control of the direction of their government and their society through free elections.

In the midst of the euphoria that surrounds these events are emerging new and unforeseen problems. The possible reunification of the two Germanies could reshape the face of Europe, possibly reopening old wounds, and the forthcoming economic community of Europe will undoubtedly diminish the dominant role that the U.S. has played in political and economic affairs. At the same time, regional conflicts continue and threaten to spread in the Middle East, Central America, Indochina, southern Africa and Afghanistan. The next ten years will be a time of uncertainty and danger, as Japan becomes perhaps the world's greatest economic power, and the "third world" struggles to develop while maintaining autonomy. What is needed is active, understanding leadership, not silence, or even worse, gesturing.

Beyond the Anglo-American context...

by Rajesh Swaminathan

In this age of Canonical revisionism, it has become fashionable to speak of a fundamental shift in perceptions towards literature. With the growing influence of emergent feminist and ethnic consciousness with regard to the Canon, it has become very easy to sit back smugly and declare that whatever was wrong has now been set right. Such self-congratulatory attitudes are grossly inappropriate in individuals; but when they become enshrined in institutions, they become positively dangerous. It is to be hoped, then, that such an incipient sense of self-satisfaction will not manifest itself in the English Department at Williams College.

To be sure, credit must be given where due; over a number of years, the department has shown itself to be fairly sensitive to the need for constructive change. Emphasis has rightly been placed upon moving away from a strictly traditionalist and parochial Anglo-American perspective to a broader one that incorporates the opinions and aspirations of formerly unrepresented segments of society. But it is not enough. Now that the Williams student has the opportunity to study Ralph Ellison and Alice Walker in conjunction with the spectral hordes of the "Great Dead White Men," it is easy in lapse into that familiar, self-satisfied insularity. But to do so is to ignore the fact that English, as a language, has had, and does have, a vast cultural and literary context of which the Anglo-American experience is but a part. The English language has been a lingua franca of sorts, even from the heyday of British imperialism; today, such is even more the case, thanks to the global pre-eminence of the United States. If the Nigerian in Lagos and the Filipino in Manila are familiar with the language, it is largely because of Anglo-American colonial societies.

That the vision of an imperialist, Eurocentric mission civilisatrice wrought irreparable harm upon the nations and cultures of the Third World is a moot point; but it is important to recognize that the long darkness of that experience has not been without redeeming flashes of incandescent genius. More importantly, it is significant that many of the manifestations of this genius have been given form in English by the native sons of these non-European cultures.

These writers have not gone without recognition, both within and without their societies. Indeed, it is difficult to ignore the potency of their words, steeped as they are in century-old memories of oppression and the ever-present need to fashion an individual and cultural identity. The writings of Wole Soyinka, the Nigerian, and Rabindranath Tagore, the Indian, for instance, are the bastard children of the colonial and post-colonial experience. Yasunori Kawabata, the Japanese, and Nick Joaquin, the Filipino, voice the anxieties of a culture uncomfortably juxtaposed between the inflexibility of tradition and the insistent "modernity" of the West.

Achol Fugard, the South African, underscores the institutionalized inequity of Apartheid and the multifarious social aspects of the Black South African's quest for freedom and identity. V.S. Naipaul, who has been severely hailed as the finest living writer of English prose, is perhaps the linchpin of this literary order; he desperately searches the faces and souls of other peoples for the sense of identity that was denied to his forebears.

Though all of these men write of and from the perspective of non-European, and more importantly, non-English cultures, they have all chosen to express themselves, at some time, in English. Thus, with regard to the study of that literature, it is critical to recognize that a plethora of fundamentally germane ideas have been voiced in that language by men who are outside the Anglo-American cultural and literary context. Indeed, they and their writings are as integral to the vast body of English literature as are the works of Emerson, Dickens, or for that matter, Ismail Reed. It is this last vital fact that the Williams English Department must recognize.

Now that the English Department has integrated three courses dealing with African-American writing into its body of course offerings, it is all too easy to rest on the proverbial laurels. Any measure of significant change automatically introduces a tendency towards self-congratulation, and hence, intellectual stasis. But education and academic endeavor are essentially dynamic processes. To pursue the study of English literature only within the narrow historic-cultural context of British and American writing is to ossify what has been, and still has the potential to be, a dynamic process of examination and inquiry.

English, as a medium of expression, that it be redefined in terms of a global, rather than a parochial, cultural perspective; it is truly a world-language and a

Castleton State College

"No more kegs" said the administration of Castleton State College in Vermont when it adopted a new alcohol policy this year. Dormitories are now forbidden from having kegs of beer at their parties. Instead, they may purchase up to one six-pack of beer per student. Dean of Students Bob Rummel said the college switched from kegs to cans in order to give students a better idea of how much beer they were consuming. Students have complained that they were not consulted over the changes, but Rummel pointed out that only three students showed up at a meeting during the second week of school to discuss the changes. In the meantime, those 20-keg parties will be replaced by 600-six-pack bashes. Just imagine the refunds on the cans!

When Kenneth Huff fails an English paper, he doesn't get mad, he gets even. Huff was sentenced to 15 days in jail for attacking English professor Jon Peterson after Peterson gave him a failing grade on his paper. Huff brought a table to Peterson, and then proceeded to attack him. Peterson suffered broken ribs and a broken nose. Huff pleaded guilty to third-degree assault, after which he was expelled from the university. The judge gave him a one-year suspended sentence, and ordered him to undergo a mental evaluation and perform 80 hours of community service. Let's hope no one tells him he isn't working hard enough.

Dartmouth College

New fire doors installed in dormitories at Dartmouth College have been unpopular with students there who feel that the automatic closing mechanisms on the doors inhibit social activities. Some students have complained that the sound of slamming doors keeps them awake at night and prevents them from studying. One student has begun a small business of doctoring the closing mechanism by detaching the screws on top of the hinges. Meanwhile, janitors have sworn revenge, claiming that any damage to the doors would be considered vandalism.

Compiled from college papers and The Chronicle of Higher Education.

by Ken Levy and Robert Howie

As last week's Record indicated, College Chaplain Carol Pepper recently sponsored a trip to an art exhibit by the late Robert Mapplethorpe in Hartford, Connecticut. We would like to address the questions that this trip raises about the role of the Chaplain as well as about the exhibit itself.

Before doing so, however, it would help to know what exactly the Mapplethorpe exhibit contains. An editorial in The New Republic (July 17 and 24, 1989) points out that "[one photograph] showed a man urinating in another man's mouth. Another featured the artist himself with a bullwhip handle embedded in his anus. Other sights included women engaged in cumming and children in erotic poses."

Alex Heard (August 21, 1989), in a slightly more whimsical tone, describes the exhibit as including "'erotic' shots of boys, in the nude, a penis the size of Popeye's forearm. In one shot, we get mooned. And in another, a man in a polyester suit has... unleashed his trouser trout. The photos with high squirm factors depict various homosexual high jinks

-- fisting, a finger catheter, Mapplethorpe with a bullwhip handle stuck up his butt, and a quite awful one involving painful genital hardware. We also see much S&M leather. Gross? You betcha."

Mapplethorpe's work thus involves, among other things, child pornography -- a form of child exploitation -- and sado-masochism -- a form of sexual abuse.

There is a great difference between tolerating homosexuality and tolerating sado-masochism and child pornography.

Nevertheless, as offensive as the content of such art may be, the 36 Senators and 107 Representatives following Senator Jesse Helms's lead are not necessarily opposed to allowing the above photographs to be displayed in art museums; rather, they are opposed to spending federal tax dollars, through grants by the National Endowment for the Arts, to sponsor this type of art. What they are questioning is not the right to free expression but rather the idea that taxpayers should be required to support works of art that directly offend their moral values. As the editorial from The New Republic indicates, "The Bill of Rights gives the government no obligation to subsidize any art, much less all art."

To this it may be objected, though, that that federal tax dollars should be used to support art that the vast majority of taxpayers find morally offensive.

The larger question, however, deals not with Congress but with Chaplain Pepper. Chaplain Pepper claimed in the last Record that he sponsored this trip in order to encourage a greater awareness of sexuality, to see "how people show their bodies." To be sure, her aims are admirable. But there is a great difference between "showing" one's body and exploiting or abusing another's body. There is a great difference between tolerating homosexuality and tolerating sado-masochism and child pornography.

By making a special effort to take students to Mapplethorpe's exhibit, Chaplain Pepper has implicitly condoned, if not endorsed, the contents of this exhibit. Considering that Chaplain Pepper is one of the leading moral and religious figures at Williams College, we regard this as nothing less than a misuse and abuse of his power.

Carlos Egan: friends and colleagues remember

"Carlos Egan brought not only his background, but himself to his class. He established a rapport with the class both through his insight and caring, although at times his aloof exterior disguised his commitment and interest in his students as purely academic. Unquestionably Carlos Egan demanded a lot of his students, but he expected, and provided, even more of himself. His interaction with us was extended beyond the classroom, as he pushed us to broaden our concept of 'learning.' His intense involvement in his discipline enriched his teaching and encouraged his students to become engrossed as well. Through his passion for learning and his concern for people, Carlos Egan has left his mark on me."

-- Monica Brand '91

"Carlos Egan had a gift for loving -- I would say an extraordinary gift, but not for the fact that he exercised it with such casual grace. I don't know what it was that enabled Carlos to love so many and such diverse people so well. I think it was somehow the contrast between the physical elegance and magnetism and Carlos' undemanding, unselfish spirit; the contrast between a mind of a naturally abstract theoretical bent and Carlos' acute sensitivity to the most mundane personal details; the contrast between his easy acceptance of who you were and his gentle hint that perhaps you really could be somehow better. I knew now that I loved Carlos not least for what he taught me about loving."

-- Raymond Baker, Professor of Political Science and chairman of the political science department

"He was the first professor to tell me that I have academic talent and potential and he has greatly influenced my career interest. His encouragement has meant a lot to me."

-- Blide Holcomb '90

gent and inspirational professor and a sensitive friend, Carlos Egan was a humanitarian in a real, powerful sense. His deep concern about the many injustices inflicted upon peoples around the world and his persistent struggle for equality filled me with awe, and more importantly with aspiration. He made this world a better, more caring, more just one, and provided inspiration, encouragement and drive for others to follow in his footsteps."

-- Julieta-Veronica Lozano '90

"He had an extraordinary joie de vivre. He was very athletic; he loved a great party; he had literally dozens of devoted students. He was also a very politically committed person who was driven by a deep sense of justice. He went into the field of comparative politics to try to improve the lot of the vast majority of people in third world countries."

humanity made it possible for him to operate without the slightest arrogance or condescension. I remember one time when the department got together to write some op-ed pieces. We were all colleagues except for two people -- one was a professor from North Adams State and the other was a former dentist who had changed professions and decided to become a historian."

"I was talking to this dentist-historian the other day, and in remembering Carlos he recalled that Carlos was the only professor in the group who had treated him without any sort of condescension. All the others discovered that he was not an academic and made him feel it, but Carlos hated any such attitude. "[Carlos] was also incredibly modest about his own accomplishments; he thought toothing his own horns was incompatible with dignity. One time, the department was making personnel decisions and he was up for a promotion. We asked him to list his accomplishments and all the great things he had done over the past few years so that we could make a decision about the promotion. He essentially refused to do this. "Another time, he met with the presidents of all the Central American republics, interviewed them, and submitted a report to the Attorney General, and didn't even tell anyone in the department about it. Normally this would be a big deal and talked about in the college newsletter, but instead no one found out about it until a long while after."

"I was talking to two students of his from the class of '84, and they asked me to include something in my memorial speech. They said that it is absolutely essential to remember that while he left students with no doubt about where he stood on certain issues, he was absolutely insistent on making his students think and make tough choices -- to make judgements and be responsible for those judgements. He was extraordinarily demanding in this sense. He felt that the whole value of a liberal arts education rested on this idea. "The memorial service we are planning will celebrate his commitments, his loyalties, his friendships. I would like to remember him as a man without a trace of malice or vindictiveness -- above all, a man incapable of callousness."

-- Kurt Tauber, Professor of Political Science

Former Assistant Professor of Political Science Carlos Egan was killed late last month in a plane crash in Honduras. Friends and students of his were interviewed for this story by Sara Dubow and Jerry Useem.

Ephs join 300,000 on Mall for national pro-choice rally

by Andrew Wright

Andrew Wright attended the Mobilization Day rally for abortion rights in Washington, D.C. November 12.

"Catholics for Choice," "M.I.T. Art Fags for Choice," "Regular Guys for Choice." The abortion rights rally in Washington D.C. last Sunday attracted tens of thousands of protesters, including well over 50 Williams students, many of whom made the trip down on a chartered bus Homecoming night. The trip was organized by Williams For Choice.

In the words of Patrick Hubenthal '93 the students went "to show that people were interested and committed" to abortion rights.

It was a quieter bus ride than usual, for the simple reason that the late start gave the rally a chance to hit some of the homecoming parties earlier that night.

We arrived in Washington after a seven-hour trip, no ordinary accomplishment considering that the ride usually takes about eight hours in a car. Walking to breakfast, the group promptly got lost.

Finding the rally site was not difficult, since the Washington Monument provided an easy landmark to get to the Mall. In addition, the tens of thousands of marchers who had already arrived -- protest organizers said that 300,000 people attended -- were set up and ready.

We waited at the Mall for a long time to allow members of the group that had been separated to rejoin the main body of Williams students. We finally gave up on them and walked to the Lincoln Memorial, where they were being held. It wasn't until we came over the hill on which the Washington Monument lies that we realized the full extent of the rally. Thousands of people were milling around the reflecting pool below us waiting for the events to begin.

As they usually do, the National Park Service downgraded the crowd estimates by half. Even so, the students at a 2,000-person college in an 8,000 person town, the gathering was immense, creating quite a culture shock. In addition, thousands more had gathered at various cities around the country [Jesse Jackson spoke in Los Angeles to a crowd of 20,000].

Lung list of speakers

In Washington, the list of speakers was both illustrious and long. Molly Yard, president of the National Organization for Women, Representative Don Edwards (D-Cal.), Senator Bob Packwood (R-Ore.), and Senator Alan Cranston (D-Cal.) were among the many feminists, congressmen and political figures that spoke. One of the most popular was David Dinkins, the new mayor-elect of New York City. To resounding cheers, Dinkins said, "We believe in choice, we believe in liberty and we will never be denied."

The speeches lasted for over three hours. Many of the men concentrated on the possible effects of restricting abortion, as the current administration desires. The crowd heard that at this time, over 200,000 women die every year from illegal abortions. In one especially moving moment, he called for the rally, a moment of silence was held because of a young woman who recently died because of a self-induced abortion -- her state required parental consent.

In the morning, before speeches began, organizers erected a temporary monument on the mall to the memory of the many women who died from self-induced abortions. Many signs and speakers said that by outlawing abortion, "pro-lifers" would be condemning many thousands of women to death and many thousands of children to malnutrition. Others spoke about abortion as a fundamental right. Their point was that if this right can be taken away, all rights could be. Several speakers then expanded their speeches to encompass other issues, like housing, labor unions and homosexual rights. Unfortunately, these speeches ran the risk of offending moderates who were there to support only the pro-choice movement and who weren't interested in more radical issues.

Even more offensive, to me and several others that I spoke to, was the tone of some speakers. They seemed to regard males as slaves or inferiors. Particularly bad was one woman whom addressed the crowd as "sisters and men of conscience." In her opinion, men aren't worthy of being brothers. Actually, there were many excellent male speakers and many men in the assembled crowd.

The National Organization of Women called for the rally because of the recent resurgence of anti-abortion activity. They fear that the recent Supreme Court decision, Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, giving the states the power to restrict public funding of abortion will result in its eventual criminalization. George Bush just vetoed two spending bills that would have provided for more governmental funding of abortion.

This, NOW worries, will make abortion unavailable to poor women, who can't afford to go to a private doctor. Because of this, the pro-choice movement has been working hard to enlist new support and increase its effect on state and national legislatures. Victories in Virginia, New Jersey and New York led Eleanor Smeal, head of the Fund for a Feminist Majority to declare at the rally "Abortion rights 3, George 0."

College Bowl wins big tourney

by Mary Moule

A Williams team took first place at a College Bowl tournament held at Princeton on Sunday, October 29, while two of its top scorers were selected to the All-Star team.

The consistent fast actions and correct answers of juniors Rebecca Sokolovsky and Alexander Rachmiel earned them two of the four places on the All-Star team as well as bringing Williams' A team to a victory over the eight other teams at the tournament. The team dominated their competition, and in one game they ran out of questions with three minutes remaining with a score of 570 to 10. And this in a game where combined scores are usually much smaller, according to team member Byong Choi '92.

"We also crushed Swarthmore [the number one liberal arts school in U.S. News and World Report's recent college rankings], and even our B team beat their B team," he added. "I was very happy about both teams' performances," said Sokolovsky, the group's leader.

Williams was eight and zero in the round robin competition, putting them into the top three for the finals. They suffered their first loss to Penn State in the first round of the final competition, but still won the championship because of their overall record.

"We were just a little slow after the break," Rachmiel said. "And Penn State got a packet that favored their abilities. It seemed to have a disproportionate amount of science."

"I thought the pressure was intense during the final game [with Brandeis]," Choi said. "But we had a second half surge and came up with the big answers when we needed them. Brandeis has beaten us in the last two tournaments in close games [as well as winning the regional tournament and qualifying for nationals last year], so this win felt good," he added.

Other members of the A team were Josh Rayman '91 and Scott Carroll '92. Another member, Josh Brumburg '92, was unable to attend. Only four members can compete in each round, however. "Alex and Rebecca played all of the games, and I subbed in and out with Scott and Josh," Choi said.

"Rebecca is very good at literature, and Alex knows a lot of literature and popu-

Khmer Rouge, because he knew China wanted Khmer Rouge, and he wanted to please China. Second, because Sihanouk didn't trust Hun Sen, so Sihanouk wanted to use Khmer Rouge; but I do not believe that Khmer Rouge are crazy to let Sihanouk use them. If the Khmer Rouge can get to go to Phnom Penh with [the other] four factions, the two [top] group will fight for power; Sihanouk will become a puppet, like he did in 1975. Sihanouk was a puppet, they put him in house arrest, he cannot do anything.

Also, the Cambodian people are thinking that Sihanouk is different from before 1970. Plus, the new generation, your age, do not know much about Sihanouk, unless you study, unless you read books; but how many people go and study about that? So they don't know what's going on about Sihanouk. So [you] only know about current government that allow them to know that they used to suffer ... ten, five years ago, Hun Sen used to be tough on them, and now, Hun Sen even more freedom. So they feel that maybe we support them, it becomes an easier way [for] their lives to get better and better.

They don't know that Sihanouk give better life to the Cambodian people, because majority of people from 18 to 35, they die or killed by Khmer Rouge. Also, it is a good thing to see, for me, as long as Sihanouk want the Khmer Rouge with him [I know that because I spoke to Hun Sen] ... Hun Sen is not going to allow Sihanouk to return.

Also you have to know that Hun Sen government, from what I saw, is not a weak army; it is at least slow down Khmer Rouge guerrilla offensive. Maybe they not going to get more territory like they used to, but they are not going to collapse.

RECORD: This summer, there were some efforts in Paris to bring about a lasting peace in Cambodia. Just when it seemed to go through, Sihanouk withdrew his support for the proposal. Would you like to comment on that?

PRAN: Yes. Why? The deadlock was because Sihanouk wants the Khmer Rouge with him. And Hun Sen keeps saying no. [Hun Sen] made a joke to me: Sihanouk is really upset that someone like me went to Cambodia; when he becomes leader, he is not going to allow me to go to Cambodia. Hun Sen says, "don't worry," he's not going to come to Phnom Penh as long as he's with the Khmer Rouge ... we are not going to let him. Also, the Chinese want to cancel the word "genocide"; they are all clever. If you stop using the word "genocide," it means there is no Holocaust.

RECORD: How do you feel about Chinese and Vietnamese involvement in Cambodian politics?

PRAN: I say both of them use Cambodia for their interests ... Vietnam ... and China want to be more of an ally, they want to get Khmer Rouge [as an ally], because Chinese trust Khmer Rouge ... It's not a Cambodian war, it's not a Cambodian problem ... It's a problem between the Soviet Union and China and they using the Cambodian people ... that's all.

RECORD: What would you see as the first steps towards establishing a lasting peace in Cambodia?

PRAN: Easy way. If they won't believe me, I guarantee: first, you remove the leadership of the Khmer Rouge. The majority of the Cambodian people don't want to see them, don't want to hear them. You ask anybody. If you talk about a common enemy, common enemy is the Khmer Rouge. They have to destroy the Khmer Rouge leaders. They don't care about the soldiers [of the Khmer Rouge]; they feel they can bring them to the national army. But the world confuses us. We, the Cambodian people, want the Khmer Rouge in Cambodia, but we don't want the leaders in Cambodia. You see, there is a difference. We say the leaders should be out, or we should leave them in the jungle and let all the soldiers join the table.

RECORD: And you think that once this is done there will be peace?

PRAN: We have two enemies: Vietnamese and the Khmer Rouge. We talk about top officials of the Khmer Rouge, we don't talk about the soldiers; the soldier is like the innocent people. They can change their mind easily. We used to worry about two enemies. Now we worry about only one: Khmer Rouge.

"I am not a hero ... I am a Cambodian holocaust survivor," said Dith Pran. Pran spoke to a packed Chapin Hall on November 8. (Thomas)

Students run local cable t.v. talk show

by Tom Dupree

There's a new and better alternative to typical tabloid television for those of you who are oppressed by Oprah, frustrated by Phil and Kate Gerkalo. "The American Pulse," a talk show now in its third season and produced entirely by Williams students, aired last Tuesday night on Adelphi Cable's channel 7.

The show begins at 8 p.m., lasts half an hour and remains true to the traditional talk-show format. Tuesday night's show featured a debate between Russ Day '91 of Williams Against Abortion on Demand and Marian Naficy '91 of Williams for Choice.

According to Producer Russ Hollenbeck '90, each show will concentrate on some controversial issue. "The idea is to make the show a political discussion focusing on topics of national and international significance, and how the Williams students have responded to it," he said. "The guests are almost always from the Williams community, either students or faculty."

"It's a moderated show. Our tone is neutral, we want the guests in to do the show," he said.

"Right now, the show is bi-weekly, although it might be weekly by the end of the semester or Winter Study. It depends on whether or not the new people [assisting with production] can work it into their schedules," he said.

There are about a dozen Williams students on the production team. Each student's particular job on the set varies from show to show. Camera operator, lights operator, tape editor and moderator are not fixed roles. Each student the production team will have the opportunity to try his or her hand at everything. According to Hollenbeck, lack of previous experience is not a problem in creating a high quality production. "On the last show, we had two people on the cameras who'd never operated one before," he said. "No experience at all and they did a great job."

The show is shot live in two segments of fourteen minutes each. The show is taped on Friday afternoons at the station's studio located in North Adams. The entire taping process, from set up in the shoot itself to clean-up, lasts a total hour and a half. Final editing is completed the following Monday or Tuesday afternoon.

Throughout the entire process, the students work without any faculty guidance. "Two years ago, the show was started by a handful of students and [former Assistant Professor of Political Science] John Drew, who knew the guy that runs the station in North Adams," Hollenbeck said. "But since Drew left, we don't really need one, since the manager of the station is extremely helpful and cooperative."

Hollenbeck emphasized the educational aspect involved in producing a show. "We're involved on all levels, so we really get an idea of how to run a show," he said. "We're learning what's like to be both behind and in front of the camera. Besides, it's a lot of fun."

He added that although shows are not planned far in advance, next week's topic will be C.I.A. recruitment on campus. "I know there are Williams students who have interesting opinions on this," he said.

According to Gengler, the friends of anorexics and bulimics are in a difficult position. A female student in the audience commented that the widespread emphasis on fitness and athletics, especially at Williams, seemed to be a drive toward perfection; "when you let them know that you know what is going on, they take it as a real threat to what they're striving for," she said.

Athletic coaches also face a dilemma since one aspect of bulimia and anorexia is an obsession with exercise. "In my role as coach, I'm pushing them to train harder and faster, but sometimes I feel like I'm contributing to the disease," said women's track coach Lisa Melendy, who was present at the discussion.

Gengler stressed that since secrecy is a key aspect of eating disorders, both awareness of the disease itself and a respect for the disease sufferers' need for confidentiality are important in attempting to help her recover.

"Let them know you are aware of their problem in a sensitive, caring way. Not, 'I know your dirty little secret,' but 'you really seem to be struggling; maybe you can explain what's bothering you,'" she said.

Gengler also said that eating disorders often have little to do with appetite, but rather with how bulimics interact with others.

"Instead of taking comfort in people, I was taking comfort in food. Instead of expressing my anger and dishing things out to others, I was throwing up after meals," she said.

"For me, my recovery was related to changing my patterns of interaction with people. It had to do with discovering that others are not going to fall apart if I express my frustration," she added.

But, recovery takes time, according to Gengler. "As a friend (of someone suffering from an eating disorder) you have to be willing to be ineffectual. My therapist expressed confidence in me and told me a hundred times, 'I think you can,' until, one day, I was ready to hear it," she said.

Jocelyn said that Health Services had become increasingly attuned to this problem. "Our whole staff has an interest in this problem. I've run groups for students with eating concerns. I've also offered a group exclusively for bulimics which hasn't gotten off the ground. We also see friends, junior advisors, boy-friends and others help them with what to say, what not to say, and when to say it to those who suffer from bulimia or anorexia."

The talk was sponsored by the Williams College Athletic Department, Dining Services, Health Services, and Peer Health.

Case against Moore still pending in court

by Jerry Useem

The court case of Tim Moore '90, who pled innocent to four felony charges, is still pending, although the less serious misdemeanor charges levied against six other Williams students have been settled.

Moore was arrested during a police stakeout early in the morning Wednesday, September 20 for allegedly breaking into the Faculty House. He was charged with breaking and entering, larceny, possession of stolen property and wanton destruction of property. When police returned to Moore's room at the Susie Hopkin's co-op to gather more evidence, they found six Williams seniors in possession of marijuana. All seven seniors were charged with possession of a class D substance.

Assistant District Attorney Patrick Gable refused comment when questioned about the status of the case.

In an unrelated case, three Williams students are pursuing charges of assault and battery against James Barbuto and charges of assault against Jeffrey M. Lohdelt, both of whom are North Adams residents. Barbuto and Lohdelt allegedly attacked two freshmen and a junior advisor while they were crossing Route 2 Friday, October 22.

According to Williamstown Police Chief John Kennedy, the assailants are to appear at a show cause hearing where police reports and statements from the students will be read to determine if the county will continue legal proceedings against them.

"If nothing else legally is pending against them at the end of this period, the charges against them will be dismissed," Bruce Grinnell, the students' attorney, said.

Bands discuss problems, future plans

by Tammie Smith

Campus bands may not seem to have much in common with world-famous groups like the Rolling Stones or U2, but they do share at least one thing: many have evolved out of friendships made earlier in life.

Just as Bono and The Edge met in school, many members of campus bands forged their musical bonds in freshman entries. Joe Cruz '91, of Misconduct, said, "Misconduct began as really good friends who lived together freshman year. I listened to their practices a couple times and then I joined in."

The Mules, also known as Henry's Fork, Dead Fish, and/or Laugh Now, had similar origins, as Steve Moran '91 explained. All Scratched Up, this year's youngest band, is composed of four freshmen and a sophomore, mostly out of Morgan West, members Ethan Smith '93 and Frank Grassia '93 said.

But though their origins may have been similar, there exists a rift on campus between the "cover" bands, playing familiar tunes, and the "original" bands, playing only their own compositions. "We're mostly a cover band. Some times it's difficult to predict how songs are going to be taken by people at parties. Usually our criteria for choosing a song is that it's been popular and that it sort of fits into the vision our band has -- sort of pop/rock," Cruz said.

"A lot of people hassle us for playing other people's songs because we don't concentrate on writing our own music. The way we see it, though, we're just trying to entertain people in whatever fashion they want to be entertained in."

"There's no question that we have a blast every time we play. But we're still trying to walk the fine line between doing what we like and doing what people want us to do. We want to introduce some original music in our set, but the main thing is to keep entertaining people with the kind of music they really want to hear."

"All of us have other things we do in terms of music. Misconduct is not our primary musical goal. Some of the guys and I are putting together a new band with original tunes, but that won't be popular because original bands don't get popular here."

James Ronnei '90, of Clambake and Mezzagrim, echoed this sentiment. "Generally, there's just a group of us playing all original music. We try to do together and do shows, but it's hard to do so on this campus because of time, and also because it's hard to get shows, at least ones where we get paid.

"Around here it seems that if you don't charge money you don't get taken seriously. But if we do try and charge money, nobody will pay us. It's so inverted and frustrating. In history, the only bands that have been truly phenomenal haven't listened to what people want to hear. Bands like the Beatles and the Who have told people what they want."

"Everybody in a cover band will have a rocky outlook because they're getting to play parties. But [to us] a band playing somebody else's music is like picking up a canvas and painting other people's stuff."

Bill Barbo '90, also of Clambake, said, "As an original campus band I feel that we don't really get the kind of attention that we should. People don't really realize how much it costs and how much time it takes to put on a show."

Even the cover bands, however, sometimes have trouble. Smith, of All Scratched Up, which performed on campus for only their second time at the freshman homecoming party, said "It's really hard to get gigs because as freshmen we don't know the house presidents."

He said they might get tougher for the groups as they plan to begin playing originals.

"At first people might not like it as much, but I hope we can train the audience. Our real goal is to make good music," Moran said.

Steve Moran '91 said that the Mules are located somewhere in between the two extremes of the purely original and strictly cover bands. "We play REM, the Replacements, the Stones, the Who, both old and new music. We also have a lot of originals that we're working on. You can only go so far as a cover band. If you want to make it you need to have your own style and play your own tunes. For now we're a cover band, but we don't want to stay that way," Moran said.

"On campus we play predominantly covers, but right now we have about eight originals. We had two of these completed and recorded them in a studio. We'd like to be an original band, but it's kind of hard to do that. People like to hear songs they can sing along to," Greg Howe '92, of Vertigo, said.

Brian Coan '92, of Nice Regular Americans or NRA, an original band, said, "We're performing something that we've made up ourselves, and that's a good feeling. The only downside is that no one will give us a show."

The band members said that the amount of time they spend practicing with as a group varies from week to week, but they usually attempt to set aside a substantial amount of practice time. Howe said, "On average we spend about six hours a week, usually broken up into two sittings."

"It depends on whether or not we have a gig. If we do we try to get together at least three times, say two nights and an afternoon. If we don't have a gig we try to get together at least once," Cruz said. The bands all face an obstacle when it comes to finding a place in which to practice without disturbing others, however.

"Rehearsing is a big downside because the music building is hard to get rehearsal time in," Barbo said.

Howe agreed. "The college provides no place for us to practice. We can sign up ahead of time for Chapin, but we lose the privilege if someone else, say the jazz band, comes along."

"There are only two rooms in the music building that can host a band, and any house that we practice in people start complaining, so it's a huge problem, given that there are something like ten campus bands," Cruz said.

Many members of the bands said they plan to continue their musical interests after Williams. Ronnei said he would like to open a recording studio and tour with members from Clambake and Mezzagrim.

"I definitely want to tour Europe. I think America is missing out on a lot of what's going on in Europe. Lot's of small bands just pick up, get a van, and go. It's a great lifestyle," he said.

Some bands said they hope to move beyond the campus scene even before graduation. Howe said he would like to see Vertigo get a gig playing all original music in New York or Boston, perhaps as soon as Winter Study. NRA is hoping to play at a squatters' benefit in New York City this winter, Coan said.

Midge Montana and Mary Roach, tourists from Springfield, Massachusetts, seemed to agree. "We came to see the women Impressionists primarily, but we're seeing a lot of other things we like. Mary has been to China, so she sees a lot of Chinese things she likes. And I was interested in the women Impressionists, in particular Mary Cassatt. And we both are taking art lessons, so we are really quite smitten with the Shop!" Montana said.

"Discriminating taste."

"I like it because the things are so different. There's a nice range of items, and the prices are reasonable. The Shop has discriminating taste," Roach added. Deming and Chaudhury both emphasized the wide range of prices. Deming said, "You can find postcards for sixty cents, silk-worm cocoons painted as tigers for $1.50, all the way up to handcrafted pieces of Joyce Scott [the creator of one of the quilts in WCMA's quilt show] jewelry for $800."

"I am very proud of, and pleased with, the diversity of the shop, to suit all tastes and budgets," Chaudhury said. The best-selling items from the current show, according to her, are the silk cocoon tigers, which move in one's hand, hand-painted puppets, cinnamon boxes, and the jewelry.

The Shop's stock also includes award-winning exhibition posters, modern puzzles, recycled paper blank books, small handmade quilts, clay whistles, a traditional Chinese calligraphy set, and date and address books.

The wide-ranging book selection covers such specific subjects as the work of Mary Cassatt or Charles Moore, more general topics like German Expressionism and Renaissance architecture, and books of folk tales which parallel themes in the art.

Visitor Bob Bahr '67, said, "There wasn't a Museum Shop when I was here. The Museum is now for the community more than the students. Then, the Museum was more for teaching purposes, for the students and the faculty."

His wife, Susan, added, "There seems to be something for everyone. My son found a drum he likes. I like the quilts, my daughter likes the prints."

Symphony to perform premiere of Suderburg's Harp Concerto

by Beth Neely

The harp will leave the heavens and come down to Chapin Hall this Sunday evening with the world premiere of Professor of Music Robert Suderburg's Harp Concerto. Marilyn Costello, the principal harpist of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will perform the work at the Berkshire Symphony's second concert of the season.

Suderburg and Costello have known each other from Philadelphia music circles since 1960. Costello is not only the soloist, but also the commissioner of the work.

The spark which initiated her request for a harp concerto was Suderburg's Concerto for Solo Percussionist and Orchestra, which was premiered in 1979 by soloist Michael Bookspan and the Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Omandy conducting.

"It was the percussion concerto that really called my attention to his work," Costello said. She immediately approached him with a request for a harp concerto.

"He came to me with some sketches of various sonorities he was interested in. They were unusual, I'd say. He likes various clusters of notes that produce a certain resonance that some composers aren't aware of. Actually, those things he came up with were used unchanged in the body of the piece," Costello said. Suderburg worked on the piece on and off for two years.

The piece weathered a preview performance in 1982 at the National Harp Conference in North Carolina with the Winston-Salem Orchestra. This past summer Suderburg completed the final revisions, and now Williams is the site of the premiere proper.

Harp concerti are few and far between: perhaps a seasoned concert-goer can recall a performance of Mozart's Concerto for Flute and Harp or Debussy's Sacred and Profane Dances here and there. This lack is surprising, considering the unique sound of the instrument.

Suderburg, in his program notes for the piece, said he hopes his concerto will be "permeated with the vibrant and reverent beauty which is the special province of the harp."

"If anything was a chief stimulus for the work, along with it being performed by Marilyn Costello, it was the sound of the harp itself, so exciting in initial vibrance, then leaving a timbral shimmer so exquisite, but so quickly gone," he said.

The twenty-two minute work consists of two movements which both begin with the flair of harp cadenzas. This is different than traditional concerti, which reserve the cadenza for endings. The middle sections of these two movements are entitled "Dark Pageant" and "Night Presto."

"They are musical journeys which lead respectively to a lyric reflection at the end of the first movement and a rather upbeat meditation to close the work," Suderburg said.

The sections in each movement connect without pause, creating a free-flowing stream of moods. But there are connections. Suderburg said, "Most notable is that the cadenza material from the beginning of the first movement forms the basis for the meditation at the work's end."

Who ever said that playing a harp is just plucking strings? In addition, Suderburg uses fingernail scrapes and a variety of striking on the soundboard with single fingers, groups of fingers, or knuckles to create intriguing reverberations and rhythms. And there are plenty of inimitable harp glissandos. In a tape of the enthusiastic about it's cause for the first hour or so, but soon it began to trickle away as the weather got colder and the speeches became more and more repetitive. Hubenthal said that he was hoping for more of an emphasis on action. Indeed, an unofficial coalition of student groups left early and marched down the Mall to the Capitol Building.

At that time, I was also leaving, going to visit some Washington landmarks with a friend. Although committed to the pro-choice issue, I too became fed up with the rhetoric. In the end, however, I believe that the rally was useful in showing Bush and Congress the support that the pro-choice movement commands. Other students echoed these views. Heather Grace '93 said, "I went because I believe that everyone has a right to choose what they did with their own body, regardless of whether abortion is morally right or wrong."

North Carolina preview performance one catches the sometimes mystical, sometimes contemplative, and sometimes euphoric aura of the music itself.

Costello has been a leading harpist in the country for the past three decades, and currently she teaches harp at the Curtis Institute. Costello entered the Philadelphia Orchestra as a teenager, following the path of her teacher, Carlos Salzedo. Salzedo was to the harp what Arthur Rubinstein was to the piano. Costello said she is looking forward to performing the work this time around. "In order to play it for that [North Carolina] performance it was put together in a great hurry, actually. Time has made it settle in my ear, and it seems much easier this time. It's a good thing to put something aside and let it mellow."

'Innovation within Tradition': the Museum Shop

by Arielle Kagan

Despite its convenient location between the Berkshire Quad and the art studios, the not-for-profit Museum Shop in the Williams College Museum of Art seems to be virtually undiscovered by the campus community as a source of creative, innovative holiday gifts. "It would be very nice for students, faculty, and staff to know that right here on campus is a place where they can go to find unusual, reasonably priced merchandise that we regard as aesthetic, interesting, and attractive," Amber Chand, the Museum Shop manager, said.

"As the holiday season approaches, the Museum Shop is now gearing itself to present an unusual, exciting array of merchandise that relates to the Museum's current exhibition on Chinese painting by Huang Pin-Hung, 'Innovation within Tradition,'" said Chand.

A wide selection of Chinese items are currently featured, in conjunction with the exhibitions of Huang Pin-Hung's paintings and Hiroji Kubota's photographs of

Colleges crack down on VCR enthusiasts

College Press Service

It's now illegal for students in Iowa State University dorms to rent a video, plunk it into a VCR and watch it with a group of friends in a tv lounge.

If some movie industry officials have their way, moreover, students at every college with a shared tv lounge also will soon know it's illegal.

"It's kind of stupid. We weren't hurting anybody," complained ISU student Steven Reidell. "This was something fun and non-alcoholic to do."

It also violated copyright law, ISU administrators warned dorm residents in September. The administrators, in a letter to students as they moved into their rooms, said showing videos to groups larger than "a normal circle of a family and its social acquaintances" without a license was illegal.

"It's an issue of public performance, and could violate the law," agreed a spokeswoman with the U.S. Copyright Office in Washington, D.C.

Movie industry lawyers say they're aggressively telling administrators at other campuses to either pay video distribution companies a fee or warn their students not to have video parties.

"We send schools a letter saying that they could be in trouble for violating the copyright law," said Tom Fox, a spokesman for Chicago-based Films, Inc., which claims to be the nation's biggest distributor of Hollywood films.

The letter tells schools they can either pay Films, Inc., a licensing fee or be reported to the Motion Picture Association of America, the New York-based trade group that helps studios protect their copyrights.

The MPAA, in turn, could sue the school for fines of up to $25,000 and punitive damages of up to $10,000 per video dorm residents have shown.

"The MPAA is vehement about protecting copyrights," MPAA spokesman Mark Harrod explained, "because if you don't own your copyright, you don't own anything."

The association, however, has not actually sued any schools or students so far. "At this point, the MPAA has not found a need to take a college to court," reported Films, Inc. video licensing director Darrell Kasper.

Yet it has frightened a fair share of campuses. Bowdoin, Eastern Oregon State and Central colleges have all paid licensing fees to Films, Inc. or Swank, another distributor, for the right to let students show videos in dorms. Groups at Creighton, North Carolina State and Central Connecticut State universities, among others, also have paid licensing fees.

The amount of the fees depends on the size of the school, said Jeff Siegel, another Films, Inc. executive. They may range from $200 to $10,000 a year.

Depending on the kind of plan the 8,000 students at Iowa State's Richardson Court dorm complex choose, they could pay anywhere from $2,000 to $7,500 for the school year.

The money probably will come out of dorm residents' annual activities dues, said Blair Laddusaw of Richardson Court's student government, which plans to decide on a licensing plan this month.

Tulsa Junior College, for one, decided such fees were too high, and opted to let students show 16 millimeter films on campus instead, said student activities director DiAnne Hembre. Rental fees cover licensing rights for the 16mm films.

"We were better off just getting the 16 millimeter films," she said.

Some campuses have decided not to pay at all. "Some schools have basically said, 'Come get us,'" conceded Siegel, who refused to name them. "We know there is a lot of illegal video going on. These people are opening themselves up to possible litigation."

The distributors depend on informants to find campus video outlaws.

"It's not being policed in the sense that people are being hired to observe," said Chicago copyright lawyer Ivan Bender. He added that a lot of violations are found when marketing companies get copies of student papers or ads, and happen to notice stories about videos.

Such was the case at Iowa State, where a client of Bender's last spring saw a story in the Iowa State Daily about a video party, and forwarded the clipping to Bender.

Bender then wrote Julie Christensen, the reporter who wrote the story, and informed ISU officials about the apparent copyright law violation.

In response, officials informed students as they returned to their dorms this fall that they could no longer rent videos for group showings. The students were not amused. They fired off a letter of protest to the campus paper labeling administrators as "fun haters." Four hundred and eighty-four students signed the letter.

Two Cities:
New York/Paris

by Eric Chiu

This Homecoming weekend, not everybody was getting "psyched up" for parties. Several students from Williams attended a two-day Society Organized Against Racism conference at Wesleyan University.

The conference, entitled "Uniting Voices: From Discord to Racial Harmony," provided an opportunity for SOAR members from 28 New England schools to share information about the racial relations and the possible solutions to racial problems. The participants included members of college administrations as well as students.

SOAR exists to provide a support network for students on the issues of prejudice, racism, and discrimination. The member institutions within the organization are encouraged to share their resources in combating racism.

The program offers a choice of academic terms:

1. Summer, 1990 in New York and Fall, 1990 in Paris.
2. Fall, 1990 in New York and Spring, 1991 in Paris.

Applications due March 15, 1990.

Voices in the dark

After an opening greeting by the SOAR president, the conference broke into exercise groups in which the participants were bombarded with anonymous "voices" in a darkened room stating various viewpoints about racial issues:

"Why do all the black students sit together for dinner?"

"Why do you go to a racism workshop? Being white, you should have no problems dealing with members of your own race."

"Why do you always look like you're squinting?"

"I am not racist. I have a few black friends."

The exercise was aimed at sensitizing the participants to the hidden bias of individuals to racial issues.

The participants were then separated into smaller discussion groups. The discussions focused on the first personal experiences of the individuals in the group and on how the college environment affects interactions with individuals of other races.

Later that day, following dinner, the participants were addressed by Dr. Arnold Mitchem, the Executive Director of the National Council of Educational Opportunity Associations. Mitchem told his listeners that "the most important thing we can do is to acquire power.... Economic power, political power, and power in general might be a better key [to end racism]."

Mitchem called the black male "an endangered species." He cited the fact that "blacks make up 2 to 3 percent of Oregon's population... however, they make up 50 percent of the inmates in [Oregon's] state penitentiary."

Many of those present criticized Mitchem on his omission of Asian-Americans from his speech. A student from Tufts said, "You have reduced the issue of racism to a black/white problem."

The students at the conference were not limited solely to intellectual activities. The conference planned several social events: a concert with a South African jazz pianist and a dance party with a live band and a decyay.

During the party, a Wesleyan group staged a KKK lynching which angered many of those present. The group, calling itself "Guerrilla Theatre," performs situations that are considered controversial in order to generate responses in the overall community. Through they were not invited by SOAR, they had apparently decided to stage something to "shock" those present.

In this incident, a black man walked onto a overhead balcony and asked those present, "What are you going to do about racism?" Immediately, he was attacked by members of the "Guerrilla Theatre" group that were dressed in white robes. In the ensuing scuffle, a man-size dummy was thrown from the balcony. After the "murder," the group quickly left the area.

The responses to the "murder" varied.

Through most of the people did not pursue any action after they realized it was staged, the shock of the incident left many stunned.

The following day, the participants attended workshops on topics such as "Understanding Racism" and "Institutional Approaches to Racism," which featured a panel of representatives from various institutions who shared with the participants their institutions' efforts to combat racism.

The Williams students involved felt that, for the most part, the conference was a success. Maureen Aukerman '92 said she felt that she was able "to confront [her] own feelings on racism. It challenged me as an individual to deal with racism."

Simon Stolzberg '92 added, "the situation at other colleges campus was that the students tended to be more aware of racial issues than the administration. It's a bit strange that at Williams the opposite seems to be true."

Besides those students, the other participants from Williams were Monique Curren '92, Marcelo daSilva '89, Brian Fox '92, Al Heredia '92, Camille Uterback '92, and Phoenix Wang '92.

Men's soccer loses heartbreaker to Albany State Danes in ECAC final

by Jeff Merrett

For the first time in the past 26 home games, the clock at Cole Field wound down with the Ephs on the short end of the score. Williams was defeated 1-0 by the Albany State Danes on Sunday in the finals of the ECAC Division III tournament. The Ephs finished the season with a 14-4 record, though, after a week which saw them crush Frostburg State in the semi-finals of the ECAC tournament and down Amherst for their fifth straight Little Three title.

The Williams offense was stifled in the first half of the finals by a combination of aggressive play from Albany State and the powerful winds which were blowing against the Ephs. The Danes had the better scoring chances in the half, as the wind helped their offense push the ball up the field.

Freshman Marty Heamy scored the lone goal of the game with 30:10 elapsed in the first half. He drilled a low shot from the left side past Williams goalkeeper Chuck Goldfarb '92, providing Albany State with all the offense it would need on the day.

Williams midfielder Orian Hult '92 hurt his lower leg early in the half and was forced to leave the game. He did not return for the rest of the contest, but the Ephs were hopeful that their offense would awaken in the second half with the wind blowing at their backs.

An easier time?

The Ephs were able to control the flow of the second half, keeping the Danes bottled up on their own side of the field for almost the entire 45 minutes. The best scoring opportunities for the Ephs came in the latter stages of the game, but they were unable to even the score.

Sam McIlvain '90 drilled a high shot from the top of the penalty area at the midway point of the second half, but the Albany goalkeeper got his shoulder in front of the ball to deflect it over the net. Rob Lake '91 took a pass off the foot of McIlvain with five minutes remaining, but his header was turned away as well. Doug Brooks '90 also had a chance in the final two minutes, but his shot sailed over the goal.

"We thought that our offense would take over in the second half," Coach Russo said, "but we couldn't penetrate as well as we would've liked. We weren't that crisp in the second half, but we really do have to give Albany State credit." The Danes finished the season with an 18-2 record.

Coach Russo also indicated that the Ephs might have been hurt by having such an easy time on Saturday. Williams dominated Frostburg State 7-0 in the semi-finals, while Albany State just squeaked by Kean College 2-1. "A more competitive game on Saturday might have made us sharper for the finals," he said.

Ephs blow Frostburg out

"We didn't expect to dominate as much as we did," senior captain Dan Calichman said after the contest against Frostburg State. But the Williams offense was in control for the entire game, scoring seven times while piling up 26 shots at a pair of Frostburg goalkeepers.

Hult opened the scoring with 13 minutes gone in the game, driving a perfect shot from 25 yards out into the top left corner of the net. Three minutes later, a direct kick from Calichman was blocked at a wall of Frostburg defenders, but the captain put the rebound into the lower right corner of the net to give Williams a two-goal lead.

Calichman scored his sixth goal on the season to make the score 3-0, as he somehow managed to knock the ball out of the goalkeeper's hands after a scramble in the crease. Coach Russo emptied his bench soon after, as it was clear that the Frostburg squad was severely over-matched.

No easing up

The deluge continued in the second half, as the starters re-entered the game and Freshman Bill Hennig replaced Goldfarb in the net. Hennig saw just about as much action as he had on the bench in the first half, though, as the Williams offense controlled the play and added four more goals.

Lake scored the first of these nine minutes into the half on a pass from Brooks, and it was his team-leading seventeenth goal of the season. Less than a minute later, Lake picked up an assist, feeding McIlvain for an easy tally from the goalmouth. McIlvain completed his best season at Williams with six goals and six assists. Senior fullback Rob Swann scored on a penalty kick midway through the half, as his low shot went off the goalkeeper's fingertips and into the left corner of the net. Brooks completed the scoring with 10 minutes left in the game, picking up his sixth goal on the season after a nice crossing pass from freshman Tsholwane Mokone.

This football-like final score of 7-0 certainly got the Williams faithful ready for a satisfying afternoon on the gridiron against Amherst.

Little Three champs

Both Williams and Amherst had defeated Westleyan by a 1-0 margin during the regular season, so the teams squared off at Cole Field last Tuesday for the Little Three title. This game was more evenly played than the Williams win over Amherst in the ECAC New England regional finals, but the Ephs came away with a 2-0 victory.

The first goal came with only 7:30 elapsed in the first half. Ambi Stern '90 lifted a corner kick that was short of the goalmouth, but Calichman headed the ball into the middle of the field and McIlvain scored with a header.

The first half was controlled by the defenses, as the two teams managed a total of only seven shots between them. Lake and Brooks both had good chances early in the second half, as the game opened up with Amherst seeking to tie the score.

Stern put the game away with a fluky goal at the 79:45 mark. He controlled the ball along the end line to the left of the goalkeeper, and his low shot found an impossible angle went off the keeper's knee and into the net.

The Ephs outshot the Lord Jeffs 17-8 on the afternoon, and Williams extended its winning streak against Amherst to seven games.

Laurin Laderoute '92 is stopped as he attempts to move past an Albany State defender in Williams' 1-0 loss to the Danes Sunday in the ECAC Division III Tournament final. Earlier in the week the Ephs downed Amherst to win their fifth consecutive Little Three title. (Thomas)

This was the first time in the past three years that the Williams men's soccer team did not conclude with a victory in an ECAC championship game. Eph bodies lay prone on the field after the final whistle and heads were bowed on the bench in disappointment as the Albany State players celebrated.

But the squad could take pride in yet another fine season. "Sports can be both so exhilarating and disappointing," Coach Russo said, "and we have to deal with the disappointment as we have dealt with the exhilaration."

Tapiach's boot, as a 72-yard reception by Wes Adams left Amherst at the Williams five. However, a strong goal-line defense stalled the Amherst drive, and, when the subsequent field goal attempt sailed wide, thousands of Eph fans eased their grip on each other.

The rivals then traded punts four times.

as a muddy field slowed down any attempt to run consistently, before the Lord Jeffs made one last attempt to toss a blamish on the Ephs' 1989 slate. A 34-yard pass play and a series of four short completions led Amherst to a first down from the Williams 12 with just over a minute left. One pass sailed long. On the next play, Ted Rogers showed an flash of the brilliance that has led the men in purple all year, storming into the Lord Jeff backfield and nipping backup quarterback Steve Bishop's arm, causing a fumble that was immediately cradled by Eph defensive end Ken Dillanian '91.

Hevey downed the ball three times, running the clock out, and, as hundreds of parents and fans swarmed onto the field, Stevens happily remembered the leiers he had received. "I think we definitely did them justice," he beamed. "It's a great feeling. Today was our day."

Williams won virtually every ruck, maul, lineout and scrumdown in the second half.

The sweep is complete

The Killer B's showed that they too wanted shirts. The Amherst fullback kicked off, but she was no match for Mary "Pump-kin" Carney '93 who kicked the ball right back out of defensive territory. Gillian Flory '92 and Laura Smith gained significant yardage as they sprinted past the slower Amherst team. With an incredible push from Alison Shapker '93, Elizabeth Feeney '92 and Christy Johnson '92, the scrum overpowered the Amherst team.

Just moments after the opening kick, considerable yardage with their strong runs. Sophomore scrumhalf Andrea Walter played tight on her defector counterpart, and she also went weak, confusing the Lady Jeff line. The line ran well with great connections from Smith to Stephanie "they took her to the hospital?" Phillips '92 and Amy "who is Gooft Bead anyway?" Sack '92. Senior inside Ellen Hazen curled well to add extra support for her teammates.

Wardrobe expansion
Amherst had a breakaway near the end of the first half when Gillian "You can't have my shirt!" Flory stole the ball to touch it back. Carney kicked the ball out of the danger zone. Just before the end of the half, Wang made a long run, helping Williams to shift back into an offensive mindset at halftime.

After halftime, the Killer B's never let down. Both lineys and scrumhalfs ran the ball well, while Gillian "this is the best thing that ever happened to me!" Boland '92 and Kathy Ryan '91 anchored the defense with tough tackles. Williams won virtually every ruck, maul, lineout and scrumdown in the second half, showing the defectors that the purple and black jerseys belong in the Purple Valley.

From the Locker Room

The true spirit of Williams comes through

by Chuck Samuelson

Saturday, November 11, 1989 is already perhaps the greatest date in the history of Williams College football. As time goes by, and the school's famous thinkers ponder the 17-14 win over Amherst, it will surely also go down as one of the greatest days in the history of the school. It was an affirmation of everything that is good about the school that Ephraim Williams founded nearly 200 years ago.

On Saturday, November 11, 1989, the Ephs "mightily battled with a storm king's power," as our alma mater goes, to overcome an improbable 14-0 deficit. We at Williams take an immense joy in pounding and crushing those insensitive dolts who foolishly left the friendly confines of our Purple Valley 168 years ago. Maybe, in some sort of perverse way, the Defection of 1821 did actually do something to help this school. We got rid of the wimps who couldn't stand the rugged wilderness and harsh conditions that have been shaping the lives of Ephs for so long. We also got a ready-made group of losers to beat up on whenever the need arose.

Of even far more import than chalking up yet another win over Amherst is that Saturday's game was not just an Amherst loss; it was a Williams victory. If it weren't for the hard work and years of practice that we all know the entire football players and coaching staff put in to make Saturday's moment possible, it would be easy for disinterested observers to think that the outcome was mere destiny.

On Saturday, November 11, 1989, Williams was thrust into the national spotlight. The football team came through as we already know. This was much more than the sun poetically bursting through the clouds as kicker Brian Tapiach split the uprights to give Williams the lead and its margin of victory. This was more than Ted Rogers' courageous performance that resulted in four sacks and, of course, Steve Bishop's fumble with only 53 seconds remaining to clinch the Williams victory.

Saturday, November 11, 1989 was about the end of the game. Where so many victory celebrations of recent years have resulted in tragedy: in looting and in tearing down goal posts, and in horrible accidents, the win on Saturday was about true celebration. As the final seconds ticked off the clock, a horde of Ephs streamed onto the field, past the mighty Security officers prepared to protect the goalposts and the law of the Commonwealth with their very lives. The screaming hordes ran past the foam pads and the yard markers that make nice souvenirs to even respectable citizens. They kept running and running until they reached the people responsible for this momentous occasion, their friends on the football team.

Saturday, November 11, 1989 was about that moment. Only in last week's Record, Professor David Weisbord wrote an op-ed piece condemning precisely such a moment. In that piece, Professor Weisbord spoke of two groups of students on campus: "those who wish to be apart from the community as a whole, who cultivate the ethos of a particular and are caught up with it; and those students who reject the ethos linked to a particular past, who view themselves here for a loftier, higher purpose." Such a division in the ranks of our student body was not in evidence at Weston Field on Saturday.

Saturday, November 11, 1989 was the reaffirmation, beyond the shadow of a doubt, of the role of intercollegiate athletics both at Williams and in America. Professor Weisbord's ill-considered comments suggested finding "other forums that allow people to express their drive for excellence." The problem is that intercollegiate athletics are not just about a drive for excellence. Sports teach us about winning and losing and about life in a way that calculus and philosophy will not and cannot ever approach. Most of us are not here at Williams to become successful yuppies but to learn about the best ways to get by in an increasingly complex and frightening world.

Saturday, November 11, 1989 was about life at Williams and what it means to all 2000 students who go here.

A major breakthrough? This was Williams' first invitation to the ECAC tournament. This was also the first year they put in a bid to be invited. Roberts said that in past years, they have played in the Northeastern Intercollegiate Athletic Conference Championships, which they won last year.

Because the Ephs won NIACs last year, they wanted to try something different this fall. The ECAC tournament is more prestigious than the NIACs, and the Ephs thought they had a team that was powerful enough to be invited.

Volleyball defeated by Bates in ECAC tournament

by Rhonda Goodman

In their debut at the East Coast Athletic Conference, the Williams women's volleyball team lost to top-seeded Bates College, 15-10, 15-2, 15-11.

"We felt that we were competitive," senior Shelley Whelpton said. "We knew [Bates] was strong; it just wasn't there for us."

Coach Nancy Roberts added that the team, ranked fourth, was very excited about playing Bates. She said their opponent went against everything the Ephs were prepared to do.

"Whenever we blocked line, they hit cross," she said. "Whenever we blocked cross, they hit line."

Ruth Burdley '90, who played on a badly sprained left ankle, said although no one on the team played terribly, she didn't feel anyone was on the top of their game. She said the squad focused too much on Bates' game and not enough on their own.

"We played them too defensively and let offense die a little," she said.

Kathy McConnell '91 contributed with seven kills. Holly Hodeman '92 pitched in with five kills and three aces, and Whelpton added four kills.

Williams is prohibited from playing in more than one championship tournament because of the academic strain that can stem from an extended postseason. The Williams team had record of 22-2 while waiting to hear from ECAC officials, and Roberts said that the team was very anxious until they received an invitation.

"There was a chance we wouldn't have played anywhere," she said.

The two other teams invited to the championship tournament included: St. John Fisher (Rochester, N.Y.), ranked second, and Gordon College (Boston), ranked third.

Women harriers first; Beitz qualifies for Nationals

In the men's race Saturday, Williams went head to head with top New England teams and claimed fifth place. Such a high ranking in the New England Championships is clear evidence of a successful team season.

Once again this weekend the team had to cope with wet conditions on the course. The sun, however, shone and a cool breeze blew to make the race conditions close to ideal.

The top ten finishers in next week's championship will be named All-Americans, a title not out of Beitz's reach.

Mare Beitz '91 ran a tremendous race near the front of the pack. Racing the 5-mile course in 25:35 to place third out of almost 200 competitors, his finish qualified him for Nationals next week. The top ten finishers in next week's championship will be named All-Americans, a title coach Farwell says is not out of Beitz's reach.

Brian Coan '92 topped off his cross-country season Saturday with a 25th-place finish as he raced the course in 26:33. Thirteen seconds behind him, captain Dale Johnson '90, ran to a 33rd place finish. Williams fourth scorer, Nate McVey Finney '90, finished in 50th place, while Tony Warner '93 wrapped up the scoring in 62nd. Bill McKinley '92 and Dylan Cooper '91 both contributed to the Ephs success as the sixth and seventh men respectively.

The men's team next year will have five of its top seven men returning to the squad, which may prove to be a key element in their future success.

Athlete of the Week

This week's Athlete of the Week is junior Anne Platt, who snooked her way to a first-place finish in the Division III New England Cross Country Championships last weekend. Platt, a 1988 All-American, roared to a 17:49 finish, leaving a field of 200 in her wake and leading the Ephwomen to the team title. Platt and three teammates will round out the fall this weekend as they travel to Illinois for Nationals. Congrats and good luck, Anne!

Williams defeats Amherst 17-14 for first ever perfect season

by Kerr Houston

For the entire week before Saturday's football matchup with Amherst, Williams left tackle and senior captain Brian Stevens found his mailbox stuffed with letters of encouragement from captains of previous Williams squads. On Saturday, Stevens and his teammates showed the letters in their back pockets and proceeded to satisfy the letter writers, squeezing by Amherst 17-14 and adding yet another thrilling chapter to the oldest Division III rivalry in the country.

In the process, the Ephemen took the final step in marching to the first unblemished record in the school's 109-year pigskin history and left a homecoming crowd of 13,671, the largest Division III crowd in New England this fall, beaming with pride.

The win, however, did not come easily, as the Ephemen struggled to overcome an early 14-0 deficit and then survived a last-minute scare. As Amherst coach Jim Ostendy muttered after the game, "We did everything but win."

Crisco on the ball?

Score by Quarters	1	2	3	4	Final

WILLIAMS	0	7	10	0	17

The Lord Jeffs, who entered the game 4-3, tried to throw a wrench into the Ephs' plans early. Eph quarterback Chris Hevesy '91, playing in only his fourth varsity game, had trouble with the snap on the first play of the game. A horde of Lord Jeffs pounced on the loose ball, and three plays later, Craig Goguen twisted his way up the middle for a 30-yard touchdown. As Stevens later noted, "they came out on fire. I knew they would."

Moments later, Hevesy again lost the handle on the snap, and Amherst once more assumed solid field position by recovering the fumble. A strong Amherst running attack offset a sack by Ted Rogers '91, who turned in a brilliant game despite coming from the infirmary with a 102-degree temperature. A ten-yard toss from Amherst quarterback Steve Archer to wideout Rob Born swelled the bulge to 14-0 with ten minutes left in the opening quarter.

From then on, however, the vaunted Eph defense, a unit that entered the game with back-to-back shutouts under its belt and that wound out the previous season with four straight whitewashings, brought its fist down.

Williams lights up the scoreboard
For most of the first half, Williams head coach Dick Farley had some trouble setting his squad's offensive gears in motion, as a fiery Amherst defensive corps brought the Eph running attack to a virtual halt. After a series of punts and Tight end Matt Moynihan '92 pushes an Amherst defender out of his way in Williams 17-14 victory over Amherst last Saturday. The Ephs shoved Amherst out of their way as they compiled their first perfect season in 109 years of football. (Taylor) stalled drives, punctuated by an interception by Mike Hyde '91, Hevesy finally cranked up the Eph offensive unit, completing several short passes and allowing back Paul Reidy '92 to fight for tough yardage. Reidy, who replaced an injured Neal Chesley '90 midway through the first stanza and wound up with 25 yards on 13 carries, proved a rock in the first successful Williams drive of the afternoon.

After marching deep into Lord Jeff territory, Williams finally erased the goose egg from its half of the scoreboard, as Hevesy scored on a brilliant nine-yard draw that left the Lord Jeffs shaking their heads.

The half ended moments later, and Williams came out of the locker room with the fire in their eyes that had led them to thirteen consecutive victories entering Saturday's contest. After taking the kickoff, the Ephemen strode downfield on the strength of a 40-yard lob from Hevesy to Scott Shean '91. A Lars Hem '90 2-yard dive moments later knotted the score at 14.

After the teams traded punts and Amherst lost a fumble, Brian Taplich '92 split the uprights with his first field goal of the year, and, as the sun finally worked its way through the clouds, Williams seized the lead.

Men's rugby takes shirts from Amherst in sweep

by Chris Blackburn

Even if the greatest master of the written word had written this story, no one would have believed it. This was really something: 24-3, 23-3, thirty black jerseys and redemption for the W.R.F.C. Amherst rugby by entered the valley this Saturday, and once again, as in 1821, the place was too much for them. A sunny, blustery homecoming it was for the W.R.F.C., and as the A-side took the pitch they knew that this was it -- their chance to finally pull together as a side, to crush the defectors once and for all, or to crumble, and allow those who say we do it wrong to be seen as right.

The answer was given in no uncertain terms. The match really never looked to be in question this time. Although Amherst's kicking-oriented offense was able to advance the ball fairly efficiently, the Williams forwards reliably controlled the set play, and once the ball was given to the line, they were able, finally, to explode, with crisp passes and brilliantly timed looping allowing them to advance downfield in significant steps.

Welcome back!
Junior Dan Hackett's return to the scrum was a welcome sight. He dominated lineout play, leaping to and catching the throw-ins that were caused by the 'Hers's persistent touch kicking. Rob Phay '91 was a force in the set scrum, stealing a number of hooks to lead to even more possession for the White Dogs. But this pack really played eight men as one, huddling to the ball from whistle to whistle, rucking with ferocity previously unforeseen, and even running and passing effectively in the line.

Rugger Steve Linen '90 looks to shovel the ball to a teammate as Ed Anderson '90 yells that he is open in the Ephs 24-3 downing of the Lord Jeffs Saturday. The B side also held Amherst to three points in its 23-3 victory. (Isackson)

Have I mentioned the line? The same fellows that could not score on an inferior Middlebury side last weekend came out this day with a mission. Sal Vasi '91 in particular raised his game, running north-south and even passing when it was necessary. This, and the precision of the line, resulted in two breakaway tries over and through the astounded Amherst backs. More than ever this season, a true team effort was displayed by the A's, without a single let-up. And a glorious sight it was to when the final whistle blew and they were rewarded with the presence of fifteen shirtless defectors sulking before them. Total domination.

No quarter, boys
The B-side took the pitch to face a craven, shaken, second side from the 'herst. Having just witnessed their A's get dismantled, they could only fear their fate at the hands of the killer B's, 6-1 up to that point and fired up.

The first five minutes set the pace, as sloppy yet effective play carried the B's to within the enemy twenty-two. Constant pressure by the White pack kept the defectors from escaping their end until possession was gained and Jon Habjan '91 broke through three tacklers for the first try.

The B-side's level of play has been higher than it was on Saturday, of course, as numerous knock-ons and penalties committed kept this from being an utter slaughter, but it did not matter. In the end, the B's simply wanted the match more than the soft fellows from the balm Connecticut valley. Grudging team defense held the 'herst helpless as individual players grabbed the glory by touching down one try after the next. The scrum play of Geoff Beard '90 and Charles Lemer '91 was exemplary, as they rucked over the evil fifteen with wild abandon. On the line, it was Tom Morgan '91 and the hobbled Bill Weiss '91 who were most impressive, although here again it was a case of fifteen ruggers that simply were not going to lose the match.

The latest crop of black shirts was finally collected, with thirty women in black on one sideline and fifteen men on the other, as the killer B's completed an historic club sweep of the defectors, who were sent home to file new jersey orders for the spring, when they will host the Little Three. Until then, rest at peace knowing that in our valley, order has been restored.

Women's cross-country wins New England title

by Heather Smith

Capping a tremendous team season, the Williams women's cross-country team blithely walked away from Saturday's championship race with the Division III New England Cross-Country Championship title in hand once more. The Ephwomen posted outstanding individual performances Saturday, and the team swept by its competition to thump the second place team by 102 points and qualify four women for the Division III National Championship race next week.

The Williams men's cross-country team tested its skill Saturday against top regional schools in the men's Division III New England Cross-Country Championship at Southern New Hampshire University (SMU) and captured an admirable fifth place among 35 teams. Marc Beitz '91 also qualified to run in next week's National Championship race in Rock Island, Illinois.

"Where did the competition go?" wondered coach Larry Bell. Teams like Bowdoin and Smith with whom the Ephwomen had wrestled earlier in the season couldn't even provide competition for the fired-up Williams women runners.

The midseason races that the cross-country teams compete in are not as big as championship races. For competitors to run in a race with seven times the number of teams that they usually encounter at one time during the season takes a change of tack. In big meets, competitors must work harder to find and communicate with their teammates during the race, and they have to maintain the self-discipline to work within the pace of the race rather than get overwhelmed by it and swept away. In Saturday's race, Williams controlled the pace of the race while Bowdoin and Smith seemed to fall apart in their futile efforts to match them.

"We were stunned by the disappearance of the Smith and Bowdoin runners from the top pack. After one mile they dropped back quickly," said Bell. In only her second season of cross-country running, freshman Helene Wilburn showed great improvement. She led the race for the first two-and-a-half miles of the 3.1-mile course. Keeping her company in the lead was junior Anne Platt, an excellent big meet competitor and 1988 All-American, who picked up the pace toward the end of the race to capture the individual title in 17:49. Wilburn finished five seconds later, garnering third place in the field of 200. Senior Ann Dannbauer roared to a seventh-place finish in 18:12, with sophomore Molly Martin only one second behind her in eighth place.

All four women qualified for Nationals next week. Williams' fifth scorer, sophomore Cherie Macauley, missed qualifying for Nationals by only 12 seconds as she completed the course in 18:28 to claim 13th place. Two seconds behind her, freshman Lindley Hall came almost as close to qualifying, placing 14th in 18:30. Sophomore Andrea Cady rounded out the team's effort, breaking the tape in 19:34.

Women's rugby shuts out Amherst

by Kristin Moomaw

The WWRFC earned a long-awaited sweep this weekend over the Lady Jeffs of Amherst on Saturday. Both sides managed to shut out the Jeffs and, as a result, sported purple and black jerseys at the football game late that day.

The A-side game opened with a kickoff by junior fullback Katy Carr which placed Williams near the Amherst 22-meter mark. The Williams scrum showed strong opposition as Amherst moved the ball forward. Seniors Wendy Lipp, Rebecca Mattson and Briar McNutt were immediately on top of any Lady Jeff who tried to run with the ball. Amherst rallied and soon found themselves in a good position to score. Gina Coleman '90 managed to get the ball and touch it down, preventing a purple and black try. In the ensuing scrumdown, the Amherst hooker had her foot up in the tunnel, giving Williams a free kick. Carr used this opportunity to get Williams out of dangerous territory by following her kick and tackling the Lady Jeff with the ball.

Tooth and nail
The game continued with ferocious mauling by Rebecca "I'm the hardest of you all" Timin '90 and great kicking by Jackie Graves '90 and Heather "we all scored" Adams '90. Caitlin Mann '92 won most of the hooks while Kristin Moomaw '90 and Amanda Gallagher '90 stole Amherst lineouts. Strong scrum play moved the ball downfield to put Williams in prime position. Determined to win some shirts, Williams would not let Amherst out from behind their 22. However, repeated scrumdowns and lineouts met with tough defense from the defectors.

Finally, Adams pushed through the Amherst triline with strong support from Sue Pitcher '90 and the rest of the white scrum. Fired up by the prospect of new shirts, Williams played even harder to defend their lead. Pitcher demonstrated her thorough knowledge of the rugby rules as she caught the Amherst team off guard with her quick response to penalties. Timmie Friend '90 also showed good judgement as she called a wide variety of plays, not allowing the defectors to prepare an appropriate defense.

The second half gave the line a better chance to show their talents. Graves and senior co-captain Kathie Lapey plowed through the Amherst line. Lapey and Liz Martin '90 tackled tenaciously to keep

CAP recommends 11 professors for tenure

by Tom Dupree

The Committee on Appointments and Promotions will recommend eleven professors for tenure to the Board of Trustees, college sources said last week. Twelve professors had applied to the CAP for tenure.

According to Dean of the Faculty John Reichert, the trustees will make the final decision on the CAP's recommendations later this month.

The eleven assistant professors to be recommended are: Donald House and Thomas Murtagh, computer science; Kevin Jones, physics; Deborah Bergstrand and Cesar Silva, mathematics; Gail Newman, German; John Limon, Karen Swann and Christopher Pye, English; Alan White, philosophy; and Laurie Heatherington, psychology. House has taught computer science at Williams since 1984, after receiving his

Gail Newman

B.S. from Union College, and his Ph.D. from the University of Massachusetts. He specializes in systems and language programming, as well as in artificial intelligence and brain theory.

Kevin Jones

Murtagh has received degrees from both Princeton and Cornell Universities. Before coming to Williams, he taught computer science for six years at Purdue University, where he won the Outstanding

Deborah Bergstrand

Teacher Award in 1985. Jones graduated from Williams in 1977, and then went on to receive his Ph.D. from Stanford in 1983. He has conducted extensive research in the field of laser

New law will force Ephs to recycle

by Linda Good

On January 17, 1990, a new law will go into effect in Northern Berkshire County requiring the separation of trash into three categories. Because of an extension granted by the town until the beginning of the second semester, the college does not plan to implement its trash separation program until February 1, 1990.

"Each student will be responsible for separating his own trash. There will be three categories. Glass and metal bins will be in one central site in each building. Next is all paper -- magazines and colored paper will not have to be separated. The last category is nonrecyclable trash -- everything else," Peter Walker '91 said. Walker is in charge of the college recycling program, run through the Center for Environmental Studies.

New procedures
Special Assistant to the Director of the Physical Plant Christine Cruz oversees compliance with this and other such laws on campus. She explained the process further.

"Each student will be given two waste-baskets, one for paper and one for non-recyclable trash," Cruz said. "We still want students to use the newspaper bins. Students are also responsible for rinsing their bottles and glass containers, which will be separated into returnable and nonreturnable."

She said that if a custodian sees through new clear bags that trash is unsorted, he will not pick it up. Custodians are not permitted to sort trash, Cruz said. "The college will take the trash to the dumpsters at the town landfill, and from there the recyclable materials will go to the Materials Recycling Facility in Springfield," Cruz said.

Campus groups active
Campus groups worked throughout the first semester on additional projects to spread recycling.

The Purple Druids were instrumental in providing for the sale of recycled paper products on Spring Street. Their "Recycling Rampage" campaign stressed the need for recycling on campus. Students who worked for the Center for Environmental Studies brought the white paper from the bins on campus to North Adams to sell.

The Williams chapter of the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group sponsored a Community Outreach Program to local elementary schools, where pairs of Ephs explained the effects of the new trash law to students.

"The solid waste crisis has reached epidemic proportions in Northern Berkshire County," John Freedman '91, president of the Williams MASSPIRG, said. "Landfills are going to be closed, existing landfills are leaking into the rivers, and the college community needs to do all it can to help."

MASSPIRG also spent the semester petitioning in Berkshire County for a

Cuts in the education budget will cause many students to lose federal grants

College Press Service

Nearly 200,000 students could lose grants and another one million students, including numerous Williams students, could get reduced grants during the 1990-91 academic year under the new federal college budget signed into law by President Bush.

Critics predicted obscure rule changes in the new budget also would provoke more banks to drop out of the Stafford Loan program. "Of the $24 billion set aside for education in the law, which provides funds for the U.S. Department of Education for the Oct. 1, 1989, through Sept. 30, 1990, fiscal year, only $10.6 billion was for post-secondary education, a 2.2 percent increase over last year's budget."

The small increase in funds for the department, which administers most federal school programs, however, was more than wiped out by the inflation rate of 4.5 percent.

"The overall numbers on the budget are not very informative," said a House Appropriations Committee aide who asked not to be named. "Although there are increases in the budget, there are more students applying for financial aid."

Almost as soon as the bill became law, moreover, automatic cuts triggered by the Gramm-Rudman deficit-reduction law lopped another $226 million off the Education Dept. budget.

The Gramm-Rudman cut, maintained department budget director Sally Christiansen, "has not really harmed the education programs. The cut is prorated among 200 programs. It's not significant." "That's a lie, but what can you expect from the Education Department?" countered Becky Timmons of the American Council on Education.

Many students will lose grants
The ACE projects the budget will force 192,000 students to lose their Pell Grants next school year. About one million more students will have their Pell Grants reduced, while over 30,000 other students will lose other federal grants and loans. "We think [the cuts] are harmful in a lot of respects," Timmons said. "The school year. Now Timmons worries the same thing will happen for next school year, especially for students.

"There is the possibility that [the budget] could cause a small reduction in grants," said Tom Skelly of the Education Department.

Budget has no new programs
The budget contains no new major college programs and is not dramatically different from the budget Bush first proposed at the start of the appropriations process last February. At the time, college lobbyists in Washington, D.C., while disappointed the president was advocating slight cuts in most campus programs, seemed almost relieved Bush had dropped President Reagan's efforts to make drastic cuts.

During his first six years in office, President Reagan had asked Congress to slash as much as 50 percent of the federal college budget. Congress did in fact accept many of the president's recommendations in the early '80's, eliminating or drastically reducing the budgets for student Social Security, National Direct Student Loans, campus housing and library programs, black colleges, College Work-Study, Pell Grants, Stafford Loans and Middle Income Student Assistance funds, among others. In 1983, however, Congress began rejecting the White House's proposals for large cuts, and generally has granted modest cuts, increases or freezes in most of the remaining programs each year since then.

Side affects also harm students
The 1989-90 budget continues that pattern, though it includes a few small-print items that could adversely affect students, including rules which through this December raise student loan "origination fees" from 5 to 5.5 percent of the value of the loan.

Christiansen also noted the government lowered the subsidy it grants banks that make student loans rise from 3.25 percent to 3 percent above the current Treasury Note interest rates.

Although there won't be much of an immediate effect on Stafford Loans for now, Timmons warned that banks may threaten to stop lending money because of the lower allowance.

Already, 53 lenders in California and two in Illinois have pulled out of the Stafford Loan program, reported the Consumer Banking Association, a lobby group in Washington.

"Some banks in the program have already dropped out," said the CBA's Fritz Elmendorf. "If the cuts go further or the temporary cuts become permanent, it could be a big blow. This could be the straw that breaks the camel's back."

Ford Foundation looks at Williams as site for minority relations course

by Dan Silverman

Two representatives of the Ford Foundation, Dr. Allison Bernstein and Wesleyan University Dean Edgar Beckham, visited Williams last Friday to talk with students, faculty and administrators about race relations and campus diversity.

Bernstein and Beckham were in the midst of a tour of 14 college campuses, including the University of Massachusetts at Amherst and the University of Michigan. They were investigating issues of race and diversity in order to prepare a report for the Ford Foundation trustees, who are planning a new grant funding program targeting these issues.

The Ford Foundation is concerned with promoting access to higher education for minority and underrepresented groups. This new program would, however, try to improve the educational life of minority students already involved in higher learning.

"We are here to discover how the intellectual and cultural atmosphere of a college or university works when that campus becomes more and more diverse," Bernstein said.

The Ford Foundation representatives met with Williams students to get their input on such questions as how well the curriculum and other formal or institutionalized activities promote better race relations, and how freedom of speech and expression issues were handled on campus over the last year. Bernstein and Beckham also asked for student opinions on how best to spend a Ford Foundation grant at Williams.

Student suggestions

Some students suggested spending for more newspapers, magazines, and books in common but less represented languages such as Chinese or Arabic. Others proposed funding for a re-evaluation of teaching and course materials so that gender and race would not be marginalized as special subjects in history or English but rather placed in the mainstream and introductory courses.

Some students said that race relations and diversity issues would be better addressed if money were spent to improve the student advisory system, pro-

Living in the midst of history

For centuries to come, when people think of the 1980s, they will remember not the disputes over Reaganomics, the war for the Falkland Islands, or even the Challenger explosion. The one enduring image of the eighties will be the events of the last four months in Eastern Europe.

The struggles for freedom in Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, East Germany, the Soviet Union and Rumania are inspiring not because they represent the downfall of communism or the victory of the West in the Cold War, but because they represent the power that people really do hold to resist tyranny and oppression. The appointment of Alexander Dubcek as speaker of the Czechoslovakian Parliament, after 20 years of oppression at the hands of government authorities, is the ultimate sign that the fight for freedom is never a futile or hopeless one.

As students living in the midst of these events, we must be conscious that we are seeing history in the making. Our grandparents lived through the Depression and our parents lived through World War Two. Someday, we shall tell stories of how we remember the liberation of Eastern Europe from totalitarian rule.

Accusations of political apathy and ignorance fly fast and furiously on the Williams campus. We are isolated and uninformed, our professors and fellow students tell us. More often than not, perhaps, they are right. It is certainly easy to concentrate on the minutiae of daily life in the Purple Valley to the virtual exclusion of national and international concerns.

Let's make sure that doesn't happen now. As liberal arts students engaged in the study of history, philosophy, political science and economics, we have a magnificent opportunity to see abstract theory put into concrete practice. This is what it's all about. Those who say the liberal arts are unimportant and impractical are merely those who cannot see what is going on around them. History isn't dead; it's happening right now, and we are a part of it.

None of this should imply that Williams students have a moral obligation to travel to Berlin and stand atop the shattered wall this summer. You don't have to fight the battles to partake of the history. What we should do, however, is read the newspapers, listen to the speeches, and watch the live broadcasts. We should absorb as much of this amazing era as we can, preserving the events in our minds, and in the lives of future generations.

A recent issue of American Heritage was entitled "A Brush with History" and related the stories of people who had suddenly and unexpectedly found themselves involved in major historical events. Now it seems that we have all found ourselves thrust into that position. If we are participants, let's be active ones. If we are spectators, let's be careful ones. Whatever we do, let's not let this pass us by.

Guarantee dignity for all humans

To the editor:
At the basis of all human rights is the dignity of the human person created in the image and likeness of God (Genesis 1:27).

A recognition of this human dignity is also a part of our civil tradition in our United States and is expressed clearly, profoundly and eloquently in the declaration of our nation's independence!

"All men are created equal in their human dignity and endowed by their Creator with inalienable Rights to Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness."

This also applies to the handicapped, the retarded, the elderly and the preborn babies!!!

Williams' tuition is mind-boggling

To the editor:
Re: "Williams Looks to Market Itself" [October 24, 1989].

So my kid does well in high school and wins a $10,000 scholarship to the best school in the state university system. The tuition for four years there is $20,000, less the $10,000 scholarship -- $2500 a year. I can handle that. I try to entice him by throwing in a Porsche to cruise around in and impress his friends.

But no, he exercises some initiative, sets up an interview in Williamstown, drives up and takes the guided tour. He is white (a quirk of genetics), wealthy (I thought my debt load was second only to the federal government), from the Northeast (the change in seasons has its moments), and I now find out he is unfortunately less qualified.

So this is the type of thinking I get for my $80,000. Kind of makes you want to throw up.

The tramp abroad: Rantings and roamings from Mongolia

by Bill Savadove

Last year, my monastic cubicle in Bascom House had a large map of the People's Republic of China hanging over the bed. The map was always the last thing I looked at before falling asleep, often with the light still on and Twenty Lessons in Mandarin Chinese clutched to my chest.

Studying Chinese is like triage in wartime: you have to make life and death decisions about which words to memorize and which to forget. "Mongolian barbecue" was one phrase that I condescended to the pits of non-memory, along with "houses fall and people die" and "close the country to international intercourse." I would make these decisions late at night just before dropping off to sleep.

On one of those nights I had a dream -- not a pleasant dream of a red chamber, but a nightmare. I was a Confucian scholar, preparing to take the Imperial Examination in a room that looked suspiciously like the classroom where I took the SAT. The examiner placed the test in front of me and gave me some instructions in Chinese. I understood every word. I opened up the exam... and couldn't recognize a single character.

The next morning I decided to give up trying to immerse myself in an Asian language while living in northwestern Massachusetts. I would spend the next year abroad.

I am in the map now, and my nights have been dreamless.

A foreign language coming over the loudspeaker woke me up, but the language wasn't Chinese. It took a split second, and then I remembered: Train number 389 to Hailar, Inner Mongolia. Hard sleeper class. The stink of cheap cigarettes. The sounds of hawking and spitting. A quest for the vanishing Mongol horseman.

I jumped down from the middle bunk, and threaded my way down the corridor. Hitting a squat toilet on a moving train is no mean feat. And, judging from the ominous pools of liquid sloshing around on the bathroom floor, the Chinese have as much trouble as foreign devils. There is something disconcerting about watching the tracks rush by through a hole in the floor -- it goes right to the aiming center of the brain.

Marco Polo

When I returned to the berth, my traveling companion was busily setting up guanxi (connections) with an army officer, so we would have a place to stay. The only guidebook for the area is Marco Polo's Travels, which is several centuries out of date. I was content to talk to a middle school teacher who punctuated every sentence by cracking open a sunflower seed, extracting the meal and adding the shell to the growing pile in front of her.

"Mongolians, they are uglier than Chinese people. Their cheeks are higher. And their legs, they walk like this..." She rocked back and forth, bowlegged, as everyone sitting around us exploded into laughter.

"Why do they walk like that?"

"They ride horses."

I had a vision of a black-haired beauty racing across the plains. A girl, that is. The discussion was another encounter with that special brand of Chinese prejudice: a combination of ignorance, ethnocentrism and curiosity. The most commonly given example of Chinese ethnocentrism is the name of the country, Zhongguo, which literally means "Middle Kingdom." This is a very superficial example. Look at a world map published in the United States. What country is in the middle? Chinese ethnocentrism is better defined as a belief in cultural superiority, a belief that minorities should discard their traditions for Han Chinese ways.

Hailar, which is located in the northeastern part of Inner Mongolia, is home to at least seven of China's 55 minority peoples. In name, Inner Mongolia is an "autonomous region", but, in reality, it is just another part of China -- the same old buildings, the same products in the stores, the same drab life.

Hailar does have a few extras to recommend it. The city is famous for "Snow Cake" ice cream. Hailar Beer (which tastes almost exactly like Budweiser), and leather goods. Mongolians, some of them in traditional dress, are visible on the streets. It was a shock to see blue eyes, facial hair and broad shoulders after the relative homogeneity of Harbin.

One evening, I watched a tall, sharply-featured Mongolian man waiting to be served in a restaurant. The waitresses all ignored him. A Chinese waitress came humbly to his aid. She was polite, but I hated to see such a proud-looking man treated that way.

On our final day in Hailar, we took a bus to a small, tiny village out on the vast grasslands. A young woman befriended us and introduced us to her boyfriend's sister, who teaches at the village school. Children learn their own "tribal" language in the crib, as well as the Mongolian language. Instruction in the Mongolian alphabet begins in elementary school. When a child reaches second grade, instruction in standard Mandarin Chinese begins.

Milk tea

The woman served us warm bowls of "milk tea." Milk tea, as the name suggests, is cow's milk and Chinese tea with some kind of grain dissolved in it. Milk tea tastes nothing like milk. It is salty. It is disgusting. It is very impolite to refuse a cup.

The village disappointed me, it looked like a typical Han village. There were no yurts, only brick houses. We drank milk tea, but the store stocked baijiu (Chinese hard liquor). There were horses, but also trucks. Some of the old men wore the traditional padded robes and triangular hats, but the younger men all wore blue Mao or green army coats. Likewise, the older women wore long skirts and headscarves while the younger women opted for the latest Chinese styles.

We returned to Hailar to face another meal of mutton. The restaurants had mutton soup, Mongolian hot pot (boiled mutton) and... what else? Menggu kao rou -- Mongolian barbecue.

place that was as cold as a witch's left ventricle. Every meal: dumplings with mutton, pancakes stuffed with mutton, mutton soup, Mongolian hot pot (boiled mutton) and... what else? Menggu kao rou -- Mongolian barbecue.

Amherst College

Federal officials in Illinois have recovered two paintings that were stolen from the Amherst College art museum in 1975. The paintings were shipped to undercover FBI agents by Myles Connor, Jr. to secure a line of credit for a drug deal. Connor has pleaded guilty to drug charges and transportation of stolen property. The recovered paintings were "The Interior of the Church in Delft" by Van der Vliet, and "St. John the Baptist" by Pieter Lastman. The pictures were valued at $250,000 and $160,000 respectively.

Tufts University

Temper rose at Tufts when a student wore a T-shirt emblazoned with 15 reasons of "Why Beer is Better than Women" into a local pub. Tera Wein, a female student present in the pub, took offense at the shirt and stood up to read the list aloud. A few days later, the original T-shirt-bearer returned to the pub with his 14 closest friends, all of whom were wearing the controversial shirts. The students were confronted by a number of people complaining that the shirts were offensive. The groups began yelling face to face, and onlookers gathered to watch and cheer. "It was a deliberate attack against women," one female student said, but at least one of men wearing the T-shirt disagreed. "It was not an attack on women in the least and we didn't mean to offend them."

Smith College

Everyone knows about those flashy calendars featuring "The Women of UCLA" or "The Men of USC", but would you believe "The Men of Smith"? That's no misprint, folks. Caitlin Hamilton and Marie Macri, editors of a Smith humor magazine, are compiling a calendar of Smith's most masculine models, culled from the ranks of professors, security officers and kitchen workers. Anyone planning to scurry down Route 2 to pick up a copy should be warned, however, that the poses will not involve leopard skin bikinis or oiled bodies. "We wanted to show men as bright guys," Hamilton said. "It's meant to be funny and we hope people think it's cute."

New tenants move into renovated Williams Bookstore building

by Damon Hemmerdinger

Two non-profit organizations, the Center for Common Security and the Williamstown Rural Lands Foundation, will move into the second floor of the old bookstore building on Spring Street by the end of February.

"We're excited to think of the top floor as a non-profit enclave," Anita Barker, Assistant to the Director of the Rural Lands Foundation, said.

"The selection process was rather simple," Terry White, Assistant Director of Buildings and Grounds for Administrative Services, said. "The retail people weren't very interested in the second floor."

Williams owns much of the east side of Spring Street. Although a walk down Spring Street reveals what seems to be an

St. Pierre's Barber Shop was the first of the four tenants to move into the new building. The Cow Bell, a Spring Street knitting shop, expects to move into its space at the end of the month.

"We're looking forward to the move," said Cow Bell co-owner Ruth Greene, "because the college is the best landlord in town. They're fair. The college certainly doesn't want any bad publicity."

White said, "Of the people who had expressed interest in the space, the Cow Bell was preferable. A travel agency made an offer, but there is already one on

"We have two very cramped offices here. The college is doing quite a bit of renovation for us. The space will be terrific. We'll probably expand our staff when we get the

"We're looking forward to being in

Changes in Europe force teachers to adapt

College Press Service

As the Berlin Wall fell November 9, so did the lesson plans of many history and political science professors around the country.

Scores of teachers say they're unable to use the books and materials that, at the beginning of the term, accurately reflected European politics, thought, and culture.

European culture, society and politics have changed drastically with the collapse of rigid Stalinist policies in Poland and Hungary, and of hard-line leaders in East Germany, not to mention the more recent changes in Czechoslovakia and Rumania.

"It's not possible to teach a standard course. You've just got to scrap your notes and syllabus and start over," said Robert Wells, who teaches domestic and foreign policy at St. Lawrence University in New York.

Teaching from current events Wells has made "weekly revisions" in his lectures this semester, forced to rely on unscholarly newspaper and magazine articles for scholarly information.

Michael Sodara, a political science professor at George Washington University in Washington D.C., also has altered his lectures to discuss the latest events. "I've spent more time on current events, and I am discussing East Germany during lectures when appropriate," he said.

In Maryland, Towson State University's Armin Muck, a naturalized American citizen who left Germany in 1951, has scrapped his lesson plans for three class periods so he could discuss East Germany.

"Students are very interested, even beyond my expectations," he said. "I think they realize that this is probably the most important event in this part of the century."

On November 9, the most dramatic symbol of the division of Europe, the Berlin Wall, "fell" as East Germany's government announced its citizens could travel freely and that it soon would hold popular elections.

Changing views The phenomenal freeing of huge numbers of people portends change in Europe as well as in the United States, where the 50-year-old notion of "free" and "communist" worlds locked in mortal combat has molded American views on issues ranging from foreign policy to commerce to religion.

"The Cold War is over," Towson's Muck declared. "(Americans) have to readjust."

But not all professors are rushing to change their curriculum. "This doesn't change it at all," said Dean Meyers, a political science professor at Indiana State University. "Political science is still in the business of studying current events. This is just another interesting thing to add."

Philippe Schmitter, Director of the Center for European Studies at Stanford University, said, "I would imagine that these changes, plus 1992 (when western European nations will implement a unified economic community amongst themselves), are going to fundamentally change European history."

Schmitter said that college courses will be fundamentally changed as well. "Courses will not be exclusively on Eastern Europe, but all of Europe. There isn't anything like that now."

St. Lawrence's Wells concurred. "It seems that any courses have to reflect the significant changes and include the role of the Soviet Union in allowing those changes."

Wells' lectures now reflect his belief that the Cold War is "dying a slow death. I'm sure some people still believe the Soviet Union is antagonistic, but the events of the last three years don't show that," he said.

Student interest affected Even though the relations between the superpowers aren't as chilly as they have been in the past, Indiana State's Meyers doesn't believe student enrollment in courses about the Eastern Bloc will increase in the long run. "Americans lose interest very quickly. I suspect that when the news dies down, the interest will lag," he said.

But Towson student Sean Brothman says his classmates are very interested in the reform movements and want to know more about these countries that had been the enemy when school began.

"This is one of the great epochs of our era," Wells said. "It makes teaching about the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe a lot more exciting."

More students wish to study in Eastern Europe

College Press Service

Foreign study groups say U.S. students have immediately responded to the vast political changes sweeping through Eastern Europe by clamoring for study programs in Eastern Bloc nations.

They say few such programs will be ready by the summer, however.

"We have gotten quite a bit of response," Juliette Shapland of the Council on International Educational Exchange said. Students, she said, are hoping to see first-hand the recent changes in Poland, Hungary, East Germany and Czechoslovakia.

Beginning in the fall of 1990, the CIEE will offer 16-week academic programs in Warsaw and Budapest. The programs will cover economics, political science, history and culture.

Courses should improve Although the courses had been set before the recent political changes, their content will now touch upon controversial areas, vastly improving the programs. "There will be a tremendous difference in what courses will be like," Shapland said.

Although it's too early to know what sort of foreign study opportunities will be available in Eastern Europe, many predict a growing number of them.

"Because the interest is rising, we'll have to look into it. But it's not something that could happen by this summer," Jennifer Fountain of the American Institute for Foreign Study said.

The University of Arizona got a head start in Eastern Europe study programs. German department head Renate Schulz had been trying to arrange a foreign study program at Karl Marx University in Leipzig, East Germany for four years and had finally reached an agreement with the school in September, a little less than a month before the fall of the Berlin Wall.

Under the agreement, Arizona students will be able to take part in a three-week study session taught by Karl Marx faculty.

U.S. troops invade Panama; Noriega brought to Miami

On December 20, 1989, 27,000 American soldiers invaded Panama in pre-dawn darkness to oust strongman General Manuel Antonio Noriega. Over twenty Americans were killed during the invasion. Though Noriega fled Panama City and escaped immediate capture, with American troops closing in he sought refuge in the Vatican Embassy. After several tense days with growing, angry Panamanian throngs outside, Noriega turned himself over to American authorities. He is currently preparing his defense for his upcoming trial on drug charges. Meanwhile, U.S. Federal Investigators are gathering witnesses and evidence to strengthen their case against the ousted dictator. In addition, the government is placing a freeze on his monetary holdings throughout Europe, as well as securing from the new government in power information such as bank and telephone records. It remains unclear whether photographic and video paraphernalia or the 200 pounds of cocaine and $3 million dollars cash will be admitted as evidence by the U.S. District Court in Miami where Noriega is to be tried. The focus of the charges against Noriega will be the alleged drug smuggling and money laundering conspiracy that investigators say has been in operation for nine years. Further deals are underway between the prosecution and potential witnesses in the case.

Revolution topples, executes Rumanian dictator

A violent, late December revolt in Rumania overthrew the government of long-time Communist dictator Nicolae Ceausescu. He and his wife Elena, who ruled by his side for over two decades, were eventually captured, tried, and executed. However, members of the Securitate, Ceausescu's secret police, fought back fiercely, using a network of underground tunnels and bunkers in ambush rebels and the armed forces, which sided with the revolution. A League of Human Rights has been established to ensure that remnants of the Ceausescu government are abolished. The death penalty has already been abolished and amnesty for political prisoners has been declared. In addition, the provisional government lifted Ceausescu's ban on abortions -- aimed at increasing the size of the nation's labor force. That government meanwhile gained the support of the Soviet Union. The two nations discussed possibilities for an open border, and the Soviet Union has offered oil and natural gas as resources for the fledgling government. The Rumanians pledged to remain in the Warsaw pact, which the Soviet Union hopes to preserve despite all the changes in Eastern Europe.

"We only needed 60,000, which shows that most people realize that this is a problem that needs to be dealt with."

According to Robinson, the law, if passed, would mandate that all packaging made or used in Massachusetts be 33 percent recyclable, made of 50 percent recyclable materials, or reusable five times.

"The Initiative Campaign is giving incentive through law to recycle and increasing the volume of what is recycled," Freedman said. "Having households separate trash is the first step toward a widespread recycling goal."

Hamlet succeeds with multiple casting

by Christopher Green

It is a shame that this review will not convince anyone to see the Theatre Department's production of Hamlet, for, as we all know, the show was over and done with about three months ago. But it would be an even greater shame were it not stated publicly that, despite an incredible time constraint of a mere three weeks' preparation, the cast and crew of Hamlet did an excellent job.

The main experimental twist of the production was the multiple casting which yielded four Hamlets: Stuart Gutman '90, Robert Handel '90, Melissa Levine '90 and Tansy Moore '90. This worked quite well and accomplished two important things: it allowed the audience to look more deeply at the different sides of a complex and inherently self-contradictory character, and it decentralized the role of Hamlet. The production was no longer a play about Hamlet but a play about Elmore, while the supporting characters took on more important roles of their own rather than hovering on the periphery of Hamlet's dilemma.

Of the four Hamlets, Gutman succeeded most in depicting Hamlet as a blend of savage misogyny and sardonic wit. Levine and Handel also gave very strong performances, with Levine showing Hamlet's gradual movement from indecision to action and Handel depicting Hamlet as a shy, elfin manipulator of conversation.

Moore didn't really appear until the second act, but he did have the opportunity to contemplate Yorick's skull, rage at Ophelia's funeral, and kill Claudius and Laertes before dying. Moore raged, killed, and died quite well, but his contemplation was far too quiet and detached. His absence during most of the first act made it more difficult for the audience to accept this "new" Hamlet.

More multiple casting Multiple casting was also used for the role of Claudius, with Kevin A. Conn '90 as the "real" Claudius and Burt Hupbach '91 performing as Claudius' conscience in interior monologue. Hupbach, who seems to be making a habit of playing male roles, tended to overstate Claudius in her brief time onstage. But Conn, who delivered almost all of his lines in a loud, authoritative monotone, made this an easy thing to do.

Hupbach also occasionally lapsed into monotone; her long monologue during Claudius' prayer started out strongly but then became merely harsh and shrill. As a whole, though, her performance had a commendable intensity that was also greatly lacking in Conn's performance.

Similarly, the lack of intensity in the portrayal of Horatio by Jason N. Gull '91 was probably the production's weakest link. His Horatio seemed completely disinterested in the events around him, so disinterested as to become at times inaudible. Conn may have spoken in a monotone, but at least he could be heard. Gull's detachment was frustrating. In contrast, Katie Firth '92 was exemplary. Abigail R. Solomon '92 was interesting, and Geoff Gibson '92 delivered one of the finest performances I have yet seen at Williams College.

Putting Hamlet together in just three weeks and making it this good was little short of spectacular.

As Gertrude, Firth was a picture of pained nobility. Her slow, tortured dispassion was one of the subtlest transformations in the play.

Solomon's Ophelia was overshadowed through the first act, but she began to command attention after Polonius' death. Solomon sometimes veered toward overacting, though when in control of a scene she was capable of deeply moving work. She seems to have an unusual talent, as evidenced by her work here and in The Lady Aoi, for playing victims.

Gibson's Ghost had to be seen to be believed. In his few scenes, Gibson convincingly presented a range of emotions from rage to sadness to terror. As the Ghost, Gibson was scary from the start, but the implication that the Ghost was himself frightened was even more terrifying. This review, however, cannot recreate Gibson's eyes, visible perhaps through their intensity alone, or the slight, masterful tremor in his voice. Gibson's portrayal of the Player King was wonderfully light-hearted in contrast but didn't quite match the quality of the Ghost. Then again, nothing else in the play quite equaled Gibson's ghost performance.

Michael D. Reisman '90 as Laertes and Chuck Pecor '92 as Polonius gave solid if unspectacular performances. Reisman was extremely well-cast and played his part convincingly enough but lacked the "world-falling-down-around-him" depth that made Firth's performance so good. Pecor's performance had one true flaw: his Polonius commits the sin of seeming to know what's going on. Perhaps this was the directors' decision, but it contrasted sharply with what the program called "the apparently irrational response to dilemmas." The heart of this play is confusion; a character like Pecor's Polonius, who seems to have it all together, goes against the flow of the production.

Little things mean...
The play was well-directed. Little things caught the attention, such as Handel's defiant gum-chewing when lectured by Hupbach's Claudius. The repetition of certain passages throughout the show helped tremendously in establishing the distinct character of each of the Hamlets.

Hall and Hoffman revive The Merchant of Venice

by Toby Miller

In the summer of 1988, I was fortunate enough to see the Royal Shakespeare Company's production of The Merchant of Venice with Anthony Scher as Shylock. Scher's fiery portrayal of the choleric money-lender was powerful and presented Shylock as a man so consumed by his own hatred of his persecutors that he places his own anger over his humanity. This has been the traditional rendering of Shylock, one whose wrath transcends the anti-semitism of the Christian characters and, some say, of Shakespeare himself.

When I learned that Sir Peter Hall had recruited Dustin Hoffman, who had never done Shakespeare, to play Shylock for the current Broadway production of The Merchant of Venice, I doubted that Hoffman, despite his extraordinary talents, could equal Scher's masterful performance. Yet Hall and Hoffman have fashioned a new, almost ethnic Shylock that challenges the traditional portrayal. In this production, Hoffman delivers a passionate, moving, surprisingly comic, yet restrained Shylock that is the best performance in an otherwise jagged rendition.

Hall has attempted to diminish Shylock's traditional role as the pivotal character and to resuscitate the play's comic value. With this as a goal, Hoffman as Shylock would seem to be a casting coup. Hoffman, the consummate character actor, brings a strong Jewish richness and flavor to the character. The initial friction that occurs when Antonio approaches Shylock in Act I is not spoken with growling hostility, as usually befits Shylock, but with ardent disdain.

Hoffman fits Hall's framework by bringing a flippancy to Shylock that softens the bitterness of his words. Instead of harsh invective, Hoffman turns his words into stinging jibes that seem to say, "Why don't we drop the Jewish/Christian role-playing and get down to business?" Hoffman has decided to portray Shylock not as a demon hell-bent on exacting revenge, but as a nasty and spiteful character resigned to the appalling treatment of the Jews in Venice. This allows Hoffman to show the wit and pathos as well as the anger of Shylock.

Some of Hall's other decisions, however, are more troublesome. Hall has the curtain open on a coin-jangling beggar and has brought certain scenes to the forefront in order to suggest that economics is the sole root of the play's polemic. The scenes he has chosen to emphasize show money as provocation for back-biting hypocrisy. For example, Antonio and Bassanio rely on Shylock's money-lending but condemn it as usury.

Also, Shylock, after his trial, begs for the Christian mercy he has just spat upon; needless to say, he gets none and is stripped of his belongings and religion. In focusing on these scenes, however, the production is awash in the spiefishness that should have been reserved for Hoffman.

The spitefulness of Hoffman's Shylock works in evoking the bitter feelings of a people resigned to second-class status. As a tone for the whole play, however, it hampers the play's progression and turns the arguing and name-calling into bickering and Portia's explanation of the bond into nit-picking.

A supporting role? It is not unusual for the actor playing Shylock to give the best performance, but Shylock's relegation to a supporting role in this case reveals a number of the weaknesses in the production. Hoffman's raw, American style clashes with the rigorously trained style of the British actors and makes them appear awkward. In particular, Leigh Lawson's very British, very stylized Antonio looks sally ridiculous next to Hoffman.

Portia and Bassanio's monologues, usually a driving force, are in this case self-consciously speech-like and glib. Only Michael Sibery's Gratiano exploits the strengths of British acting well enough to be an effective contrast to Hoffman.

Hall's gamble in using an initiated American actor to create a new Shylock was successful. Had Hoffman and Hall tried to go the classical path, like Anthony Scher, it most likely would have been a weak rendition. Backed as it was, however, by classical British acting, the production sacrificed consistency for an uneven performance.

On the technical side, both Neil Peter Jampolis' discrete lighting and Chris Dyer's functional design were tasteful and highly appropriate.

Can you write like this?

"Yet the most valuable aspect of their performance for the audience was the display of erotic power that can overcome both performers and listeners."

"You can ski, only to be chain whipped by a body nazi trying to get ahead of you in the lift line."

Little Three championship for men and women swimmers

by Mike Lane

The Williams men's and women's swim teams enter the month of January undefeated and as Little Three champions. Their seasons began on December 3. With the lilting strains of Michael Barranti's stirring rendition of "The Mountains" (including the recently discovered fifth verse) still ringing in their ears, the Ephs marched into the 'Herat with a mission: to capture both meets for the first time in the three-year-old Pratt pool. Amherst had traditionally been a spoiler at home, upsetting both teams in recent years.

The women started off and took no prisoners. They grabbed the lead with a smoldering relay victory by Dore Lebeau '91, Ulla Pitha '93, Liz Hickey '93, and Abbe Marra '93. After this point they never looked back.

The young charger of the team was displayed with crushing force in victories by freshmen Vanessa "Mercedes" Gibbons in the 500 and 1000 freestyles, "Eat My Waves" Marra in the 50 freestyle, "Bonecrusher" Hickey in the 100 and 200 butterfly, and "The ripper" Pitha in the 200 individual medley. Both Pitha and Hickey qualified for nationals, Pitha in the 200 breaststroke and Hickey in the 200 butterfly. Pitha was also named to the 1989-90 John Madden all-name team.

Junior Lee "Peacock" Schroeder saved upperclass pride by recording a victory in the 100 freestyle. When the smoke cleared, the final score was an exhilarating 178-122 Williams victory. With this victory the women sent a message across New England that they would be a contender at the league meet in February.

Men squeeze by

The men's meet was much closer. Amherst, led by the sensitive head mutant Tom "Lurch" Donley, jumped to an early lead with victories in the medley relay, the 50 and 1000 freestyles and the 200 individual medley. Sophomore Greg "Big Daddy" Jordan gave the Ephs their only early victory with a blazing 200 freestyle.

With the 'Herat fired up and ahead, the Ephs looked to their divers for a rally. Scott "Lube" Schwager '91, Brian "Mike Tyson" Cameron '90, and Drew "Barney" Ades '92 thrashed the Amherst squad, whose diving skills were remarkably close to those of the three stooges.

Following the diving, Chris "Dude" Colburn '93, "Suite" Barry King '93, and Alex "Leadbelly" Webster '92 swept the 200 butterfly. Refusing to let up, the Ephs compiled victories in the 200 backstroke by senior Chris "Surge" Cicuzio and the free relay of Ivan "Scrappy-do" Sigal '91, "Gus" Kohn '93, Dan "Boat" Snyder '90 and Greg Jordan '92.

The Ephs captured the Little Three crown with a relaxing meet against Wesleyan. Coach Carl Samuelsen had to pull his punches to prevent an utter humiliation of the Cardinals. The highlights of the meet were nationals qualifications by divers Patty "Sky" Althoff '92 and Kathia "Head First" Vandevonne '91.

On December 26 the Ephs were at sunny

Ft. Lauderdale for the Ed Kennedy Classic swim meet, the HOPF Ocean Mile and Coach Samuelsen's newest version of torture — three practices a day. The combination of late night and early morning workouts caused the breaststrokers on the team to spend the nights in the team vans instead of the hotel. The women's relay of Carrie "the Killer" Curtis '93, Lesley "Moana" Nye '93, Marra and Schroeder shattered the meet record with a lightning fast 200 free relay.

The Ephs now look forward to double practices during Winter Study, and meets at UMass on Saturday and home against Hamilton on the 26th.

reach, making 19 of 27 from the charity stripe on the game.

Four Ephs scored in double figures, with Jones, who had been averaging 9.4 points per game, leading the way with 19. Jeffrey Miller '91 netted 13, Williams had 12, and Vaughan added 10 points. Jones said that he didn't feel any additional pressure to score with Major out of the game. "The shots were there for me and I took them. We were making good passes and getting a lot of people open shots."

Coach Sheehy applauded Jones' scoring and also singled out Lipsky, who saw a lot of extra playing time at guard and rose to the occasion in the absence of Major. The team's depth and balance was clearly a key factor in the victory, but Sheehy acknowledged that Haverford is one of the weaker teams on the Williams schedule. "After defeating a team like Hamilton, we really couldn't afford to lose to a team like this," he said.

4-1 December record

The Ephs opened their season before the holidays with three victories over Norwich, Framingham, and MIT, before a tough ten-point loss on the road to the top-ranked North Adams State Mohawks. A thrilling 75-70 home win over a highly regarded Hamilton squad left the Williams record at 4-1 for the month. The backcourt tandem of Major and Conte led the Ephs in scoring in December with an average of 17.2 and 11 points per game respectively. Tomorrow night the team travels to Schenectady to face Union in an ECAC clash.

Headrick '91 (3-4) line and his own line with Zinnman (2-5) and Rob Abel '91 (2-0). Santry has two goals and an assist on the year.

But both the captain and defenseman Dave Bakken '90 feel that the offensive strength of the team lies in its balanced attack. "If we score five goals it's usually five different people scoring them," said Bakken, who is tied with Jim Jasinski '93 for the lead among defenders with two goals.

Williams had opened its season nearly two months earlier by downing Connecticut College 7-4. Van Belle had two goals and two assists as Williams scored six straight goals to come from a 2-0 deficit to defeat the Camels. Ford saved 34 shots, including 27 of 29 in the last two periods to get the away win. Defenseman Rick Lafemiere '92 tallied two assists.

The squad's first loss

A week later, Hamilton dumped Williams 5-2. Van Belle scored in the first period, as did Continental Charles Gilbert. Junior Rob Abel's second period goal gave the Ephs a 2-1 lead. But Gilbert tallied three assists in the third period as the Continentals scored four goals to down Williams at Hamilton.

In the squad's first home match on November 27, American International College posted a 5-3 victory over the host Ephs. Bakken scored twice, but Williams nonetheless dropped to 1-2, as they only managed 19 shots in the game. Seguin scored 1:27 into the next contest at Norwich, but that goal was followed by six consecutive Norwich goals in a 14:03 span off goaltender Matt Zolin '91. Zolin did not allow another goal in the last 44 minutes, and Van Belle scored twice to attempt to rally the Ephs against the number seven team in the ECAC.

Six days later, Trinity centers Michael Murphy and Bill Macortney scored 2:46 apart late in the first period to put the Bantams up 2-0 at the first intermission. But late in the second period, the Ephs tied the game on goals by Chris Headrick '91 with 2:11 to play and by captain Rob Santry '90 with :03 to play. Seven minutes into the final stanza, Headrick scored again to give Ford the win. Seguin and Van Belle each had two assists.

The Ephs raised their record to 3-3 and closed out 1989 with a 6-4 downing of Tufts at home. Seguin and Zinnman each scored twice, Van Belle scored his sixth goal, and Jasinski scored his second power play goal to defeat the Jumbos. The team's next game is Saturday at home against New England College.

match. On the upstairs courts, Dave Bank '90 duplicated Hunt's feat in an even more dramatic way, starting down six match points against him to come up with a 3-2 victory against his seventh-ranked Williston opponent.

The sophomore tide Though seniors controlled the heroic play department on Saturday, the class of '92 makes up the bulk of the Williams team. Of the fourteen Eph players in the tri meet, ten were sophomores. Johnson said he especially wants to give experience to these players, many of whom did not play squash before they entered Williams.

This would presumably strengthen the varsity team's prospects for the future. Johnson said that the j.v. serves as a kind of "minor league" for the varsity squad. Saturday's match and a December 4 split with Babson College's nascent varsity team leave the j.v. Ephmen with a 2-2 record. They will bring this record and their determination to the courts when they return to Lasell for tomorrow's showdown with Harvard, an event in which the varsity will also participate. The match may well prove difficult for the Ephmen, as Harvard will likely be ranked among the nation's top three teams this year.

After tomorrow, five more matches await the junior varsity squad, although coach Johnson hopes to add to that schedule. He professed his willingness to play any school able to "drop by," as he says. December's match against Babson resulted from just such an arrangement. In the meantime, the j.v. men will continue their schedule of hard practice and determined play.

Women's basketball squad looks forward to rest of schedule after rocky 1-2 start

by Asli Bali

The women's varsity basketball team started off this year's season with a bang on November 27 with an easy win over Skidmore, and continue to look promising. Although the Ephwomen faced some difficulties in their first few games, they appear to be on their way to a solid record.

The second game of the season was played on December 2 against Middlebury. It was a very close game that the Ephwomen lost by only two points, with a final score of 69-67. The third game of the season was against Connecticut College on December 5, which ended in a 73-51 loss for Williams.

At the end of the first semester the women's record was 1-2, but the team is not discouraged by its losses. Co-captain Karlyn McNall '90 said that the team is very young and inexperienced.

"The team has an excellent work ethic and, with the additional strength of a lot of good incoming freshmen, should do well the rest of the season," McNall added. Juliana Walsh '90 is this year's other co-captain.

Coach Nancy Roberts also stressed the support that the incoming freshmen were giving the team. In addition to the roster from this year's freshmen class are Kerry Mularczyk, Melissa Osborne, Kate Sharkey, Sam Spina and Amy Strode. "There are a lot of good players among the freshmen and they have already proved themselves valuable assets in the games," Roberts said. "Unfortunately, over the break Amy Strode, who promised to be a real strength in the second semester, underwent arthroscopic surgery, and will not be able to play the rest of this season. Although she plans to rehabilitate over the spring, her loss this season will be felt by the team."

The outlook for the season is very positive overall. The team lost four starters from last year's team, with Nancy Hedeman, Missy Crouchley and Julia Beasley graduating and Chrissy Codign taking the year off. Among this group were two very high scorers and their loss has meant that this winter's team has had to compensate offensively.

"In trying to make up for the loss of two excellent shooters, we made some mistakes in the first semester that we are going to work on avoiding in the rest of the season," Roberts said.

The team's performance early in the season reflected its youth, the loss of graduating players, and also the academic pressures of the end of semester. Nonetheless, the team plans to improve on its record. With a good deal of practice time scheduled over Winter Study, the team hopes not only to gain experience but to also become increasingly cohesive. In any case, through hard work and dedication the 1989-90 women's hoops team has shown they're out to win.

Athlete of the Week

This week's Athlete of the Week is hoopster Sherman Jones '92, who pitched in with 19 points to lead the men's basketball team to a triumph over visiting Haverford on Saturday. Jones, who had been averaging 9.4 points entering the game, stepped in to fill the void left by senior scoring leader Garcia Major, who went down midway through the game with a hamstring injury. Congratulations, Sherman!

Women's squash team displaying optimism

by Kerr Houston

After three lopsided matches, two of which were losses at the hands of national powers, the Williams women's varsity squash team is struggling to find some measure of equilibrium in a season devoted to improvement and transition. The team, which lost five of last year's top nine players to graduation, opened its 1989-90 campaign with a 9-0 thumping at Brown, a team that, as coach Gail Ramsay later joked, was "pretty good."

However, the women rebounded with an 8-1 whitewashing of Wellesley on December 2. Three days later, the team hit the road once more for the third in a string of seven consecutive road matches, and then fell to a strong Yale nine 9-0.

High hopes

With an interesting mix of experience and youth comprising this winter's top nine seeds, Ramsay said, "We're looking to stay in the top ten this year. We have a chance to do fairly well against Dartmouth, and hopefully we can send three or four players to Nationals."

Junior Lisa Brayton has been playing in the top spot so far this year, with senior captain Susan Piper playing number two and freshman Jen Thurman rounding out the top three. Veteran senior Timmie Friend is in the number four slot, while Miriam Marcus '91, Kristin Forbes '92 and Christina Ohly '90 have been playing five, six, and seven respectively. Amanda Crane '91 and Holly Hedeman '92 round out the top nine, which travels to Middlebury on Saturday and then heads to Hanover next week.

Women's J.V. squash team at 1-2

by Allison Meade

Last Saturday the women's j.v. squash team split into two units to play teams fielded by Hockkiss and Deerfield. The team's top five players were overwhelmed by a Hockkiss team which appeared a bit more experienced in match play. The Williams squad won only one of the best-of-five matches, with a 3-1 decision going to Sarah Southall '93, 10-15, 16-14, 15-4, 15-12, at the number three spot.

The match against Deerfield, played on the same day, was a different story. The inexperienced, young Deerfield team, fielded by the school in its first co-ed year, was no match for the rest of the Williams team, which dropped only one of ten matches. Whiting Dimock '92 and Cheryl Liechty '93 posted grueling five-game victories with Dimock winning 13-15, 15-11, 15-10, 11-15, 15-13 and Liechty pulling off a 15-13, 10-15, 15-10, 11-15, 15-12 win.

In their first taste of match play, the j.v. team, with many players staying home to study for exams, was downed 4-0 in New Haven by an outstanding Yale team before the winter break.

The team's next match is at home on January 13 against Taft.

Early season victories over Boston U., Skidmore for women skaters

starting keeper Sue Pitcher '90 had ured in a scoreless first period. The squad will enter Saturday's contest at Middlebury with a 2-1-1 record in its pocket.

The squad's two victories came early in the season, as a four-goal evening by Lynch on November 18 led to a 7-1 whitewashing of an outmanned Boston University team. The game was reasonably close through two periods, as three Lynch goals had offset one Boston U. tally. The final stanza, however, was a virtual Williams hockey clinic, as freshman whiz Sharon McGee scored with 13:33 remaining, and goals by Lynch, Christopherson, and Nina Coslov '93 rounded out the scoring as Williams roared to a 1-0 record. The next game was tighter, but a Pitcher shutout made a 3-0 victory over Skidmore look easy. Tri-captain Kristin Moomaw '90 scored a first-period goal, and Lynch and Christopherson also notched tallies.

The final stanza, however, was a virtual Williams hockey clinic.

as Williams overcame three shorthanded situations to post a 2-0 record. The bubble burst on December 2, however, as a strong Middlebury team gave Williams a dose of its own medicine by handing Briggs and his skaters a 3-0 shutout loss. The Panthers outshot their hosts 36-5 and stayed out of the penalty box for the entire contest in defending their reputation as one of the premier women's teams in New England.

One night later, the team remained flat as it traveled to Troy and posted a 1-1 tie against R.P.I. McGee broke a scoreless battle with only nine minutes left in the final period, but the Engineers refused to give up and knotted the score for good two minutes later to earn a tie and leave Williams with a 2-1-1 mark. The Ephwomen will try to improve upon that record and to gain revenge on the side as they travel to Middlebury on Saturday for a second showdown with the Panthers.

Men's basketball lifts record to 5-1

Jones pours in 19 to spark hoops team to 78-65 win over Haverford

by Jeff Merritt

In its first game of 1990, the Williams men's basketball team faced a sterner test than it may have expected. Part of that test came from the evening's opponent, a Haverford squad that came into the Chandler Athletic Center on Saturday night with only a 2-4 record but stayed with the Ephs for almost the entire contest.

The Ephs were tested also, though, by the left hamstring of captain Garcia Major '90, which sent him to the floor late in the first half and effectively ended his night. The Ephmen faltered at first without their leading scorer, but eventually pulled away for a 78-65 victory that raised their record to 5-1 on the season.

Williams jumped out to an early 13-8 lead on the strength of six points from Major, but Haverford battled back to claim the advantage at 20-19 after a three-pointer just past the ten-minute mark. The Ephs responded with a 13-3 run, backed by six points from forward Sherman Jones '92 and some pinpoint passing from guards Josh Lipsky '90 and John Conte '92. This spurt gave the Ephs a nine-point lead, but Haverford closed the gap to two with about two minutes left in the half.

Major's hamstring gave out on a non-contact play with 1:18 left in the half. The initial Williams response to the loss of their floor leader was four quick points, which stretched the margin to 38-32 at halftime.

The teams traded lay-ups early in the second half, as Major attempted to play but was soon forced to the bench. With the Ephs appearing hesitant on offense, Haverford went on a 15-2 run over a six-minute span, building a 49-42 lead with a pair of free throws just after a Williams time out.

"When we called that time out down by seven points we were worried," coach Harry Shesby said. "The team seemed to miss not so much his [Major's] leadership abilities, but just his presence on the floor."

The Ephs outscored Haverford 12-2 over the next three minutes, however, as a slew of veterans stepped forward to fill the offensive void created by Major's absence. Senior Rich Williams buried a three-pointer, Lipsky scored on an inside lay-up, and sophomore Lindsey Vaughan gave the Ephs on a lead they would never relinquish off the rebound of a missed free throw by Conte. Jones also had four points during the spurt, which brought the crowd at Chandler to their feet and resulted in a Haverford time out with the score at 54-51.

Ephs ice the game

Haverford closed the gap to one, but a pair of free throws from Lipsky and back-to-back three-pointers from Conte and Williams stretched the margin to 62-53. The Ephs sank 10 free throws in the final five minutes to put the game out of the door.

Williams J.V. hoops hoping to improve 1-2 mark

by Paul Grossman

The Williams junior varsity basketball squad, having undergone a near-complete rebirth since last year through the hiring of coach Mike Masters '89 and the enthusiasm of a bevy of new freshmen, now stands at 1-2 after a close loss in its home debut. The team's inexperience was reflected in the first game of the season as they fell to Northfield-Mt. Hermon 76-64, but they were able to turn around and crush Deerfield Academy the following week, 89-68.

The team returned to the Purple Valley on December 9 to play its home debut against an aggressive Hamilton team. The Ephs had trouble playing against the fast-paced, risk-taking style of the Hamiltonians in the first half, committing numerous turnovers despite a medium-tempo offense. However, the squad made a valiant comeback bid in the second half, led by the inspired play of sophomore guard Tim Snyder and an aggressive halfcourt press, only to fall short in the end, 79-71.

The first three games were marked by outstanding individual performances by freshmen Adam Brandt and Pat Duqueine, who averaged 35 and 21 points a game respectively. The squad can also continue to rely on the steady play of John Nasser '93, who missed the Hamilton game due to a leg injury, an enthusiastic bench, and the experience of Masters, who played four years of varsity hoops at

Williams and now juggles his duties as j.v. coach with a spot on a professional soccer team.

As soon as the team is able to reduce its turnovers and to form a more cohesive offense by integrating the talents of big men Wayne Franklin '93 and John Engel '93, it will be a force to be reckoned with. The team's next test will come tomorrow, as the Ephmen climb on the bus and head to Schenectady, New York for a showdown with Union.

Men's hockey falls to top-ranked Union

by Kevin Greenberg

A 4-0 loss to nationally-ranked Union College on Saturday left the Williams men's hockey team with a 3-4 overall record and an 0-4 ECAC mark entering last night's game at Holy Cross. While that mark may seem disappointing, three of the four downings are to top-ranked programs and the Ephs believe that they have a realistic shot at advancing to post-season competition.

In a five-day period after Thanksgiving, the team suffered losses to Hamilton, 5-2, American International College, 5-3, and Norwich, 6-3. But Williams managed a 3-2 victory over Trinity and a 6-4 downing of Tufts before winter vacation to ease their record to 3-3.

The squad took a long break for finals and the holidays and returned to action Saturday against Union, the second-place team in the ECAC. "After three and a half weeks off you don't know what to expect," said first-year Eph coach Bill Kangas, adding that the 4-0 score was not indicative of Williams' ability. "After the long layoff, to play as well as we did was a bonus."

A shorthanded tally

The Ephs did indeed play well, staying even with the Dutchmen (7-2-2) for almost 14 minutes. Williams even looked as if they were about to take the lead when, with 8:07 to play in the first period, Union captain and leading scorer Guy Logan was called for holding.

But the only team to score on the penalty was Union. With 6:09 to play, right wing Nick Baratoff pounced on the rebound of a Rick Clifford shot and put it over outstretched goaltender Sean Ford '90 for a shorthanded goal. It was not the last time that Baratoff and Clifford would combine to sting the Ephs.

Williams' best scoring chance came on a different power play in the first period. With 4:29 left, Ron Van Belle '90, the team's leading scorer for the fourth consecutive season, pushed a shot to the left of Dutchman goalie Ron Kinghorn. But the shot hit the outside of the post and caromed away.

The Ephs played well for the rest of the period and even jumped out early in the second stanza. Wing Andrew Zimmerman '92 jumped out of a play in the Eph zone and drove towards Kinghorn 20 seconds into the period. But Kinghorn stopped his shot and Williams did not mount another good scoring chance for over 19 minutes.

"We were playing it rope-a-dope," Kangas said. "We got caught in our zone and we had problems changing [lines]."

In those 19 minutes Union had 14 good chances, two of which found their way past Ford into the Eph net. Just 1:41 into the period, Clifford took a Baratoff rebound and put it into the net. Six minutes later, a Clifford shot bounced to Baratoff, whose shot deflected to center Mike Flanagan who put it into the net to give Union a 3-0 lead. The Clifford-Flanagan-Baratoff line is Union's third line.

Williams played the third period much as they did the first, staying with Union up and down the ice. "We had two very good periods tonight in the first and the third," Kangas said. "Hopefully, we can build on those."

The Ephs stayed with the Dutchmen and even got two power plays against Union, which has killed a remarkable 93 percent of its opponents' advantages. But again the only goal scored was by Union, as Marc Gougen took a pass from Scott Whitney at the point and fired the puck past Ford with 10:59 left in the game.

Although Ford gave up all four goals, he had an excellent night in the net. Ford faced 44 shots off the Dutchmen rifles and managed to deflect 40 of them, several of which brought roars from the home crowd. After the game Kangas was happy with the play of his goalie.

"Ford did a really nice job in goal. There were a lot of shots from in close," he said. Close shots tend to lead to rebounds, which is how Union got three of its four goals.

"They outshot us. We could have blocked a few more shots [before they got to Ford], but we did a pretty good job defensively," captain Bob Santry '90 said. "Offensively we had trouble establishing any possession in their zone."

Leaders and balance

The captain pointed out two lines to whom the team is looking for scoring leadership: the Van Belle (6 goals-6 assists), Sean Seguin '91 (3-6) and Chris

Women's hockey iced by alums in scrimmage; record stands at 2-1-1

Veterans return home, hardly miss a beat in 5-1 victory

by Kerr Houston

Thirteen Williams graduates donned pads and laced up their skates on Saturday to face the women's hockey team in the annual Alumnae Game. It appeared that the veterans had hardly missed a beat as they skated to a solid 5-1 victory.

The alums, decked out in various colors and cheered on by a small contingent of husbands and parents, brought a loose, end-to-end brand of hockey to Lansing-Chapman Rink. The game remained a scoreless deadlock until the 5:39 mark of the second period, when a soft shot tricked off the stick of Alexandra Novitski '93 and into the Williams net.

Just over a minute and a half later, the alumnae swelled their lead to 2-0 as they cashed in on a crisp two-on-one breakaway. Before the crowd could catch its breath, however, the alumnae scored once again, as an intercepted pass led to a cakewalk breakaway and a 3-0 lead 7:05 into the second stanza.

Magnuson ends drought

Coach James Briggs' troops, led by the inspired hustle of tri-captain Kara Lynch '90, responded with some offensive pressure of their own. They finally converted opportunities into a tally when Jill Magnuson '90 lifted a backhand over a sprawled defenseman with 4:39 remaining in the middle period to light up the Williams half of the scoreboard.

The younger squad, enjoying a deep bench and familiar teammates, dominated the rest of the period. Kathy Lapey '90 turned in some nifty passes and shep forechecking, and Alex Page '92 nearly turned a beautiful Holly Christoferson

'92 lead into a backhand goal as the period ended.

The alumnae used the final period, however, to freeze their victory. A centering pass bounced into the Williams goal with just over ten minutes remaining to give the alumnae a 4-1 lead. The remainder of the contest was filled with partial breakaways and dangerous wrist shots primarily by the alumnae, who added a final score with 3:03 remaining and wound up all smiles after a 5-1 triumph.

Season to date: a 2-1-1 record

The loss to the alumnae does not appear as a blemish on the team's season record, for it was only a scrimmage. This fact led Briggs to give Novitski the nod after

Powerful Princeton squad blanks men's squash

by Rhonda Goodman

The men's squash team's first match against Division I Princeton was a lot tougher than the Ephmen had thought it would be. They lost to Princeton, 9-0, in an afternoon that saw the highly touted Tigers win each of the top nine matches without dropping a game.

Despite some long, drawn-out points and intense series of low drives and soft drops, top seed and 1989 All-American Bruce Hoppey '92 lost to Princeton's Chris Stevens in three games, 4-1, 5-6, 15-5. On court two, freshman wonderkid Andy Clayton had his hands full, eventually falling to his strong opponent 9-15, 6-15, 9-15.

Junior Chris Pentz, playing in the number three slot, turned in one of the stronger Williams performances of the afternoon, hanging tough before finding himself on the slim end of a 10-15, 7-15, 9-15 score. Senior captain John Birgbauer struggled through a game full of hinder calls and some brilliant through-the-leg shots before falling to Tiger Derek Finkle 6-15, 7-15, 9-15.

Tiger domination?

Fifth seed Bob Illig '91 fell 6-15, 7-15, 5-15, as did senior Steve Buxbaum, who was playing in the sixth slot and lost 4-15, 6-15, 7-15. Seventh seed James McLain III '93 seemed to improve as the afternoon progressed but nonetheless dropped his match 1-15, 6-15, 8-15. Finally, eighth seed Henry Woo '91 lost 4-15, 16-17, 8-15, and senior Don MacKinnon fell 8-15, 8-15, 2-15.

Although only the top nine matches counted toward the dual meet, three exhibition matches may nonetheless have brought a smile to coach Dave Johnson's face. In the tenth slot, Williams' Zia Mahmood '90 pocketed the only Eph victory of the afternoon, posting a 17-14, 15-13, 15-10 triumph, and seniors Matt Tarnes and Chris Jones also fared reasonably well in their matches.

The Princeton coach was modest in his post-match conversation with Eph mentor Johnson, however, saying, "We've got a few years on you [the Ephmen graduated five of last winter's top players]. Soon you'll be looking forward and we'll be looking backward." Although no midseason rankings are issued, the Tiger coach guessed that Princeton is "probably about number three in the country."

Men's J.V. squash splits against prep schools

by John Bugbee

Point-by-point cliffhangers went side by side with no-contest blowouts last Saturday as the men's junior varsity squash team split two matches with prep schools Trinity-Pawling and Williston. The blowouts came predominantly from the Williston match, in which the Ephmen dropped only three games in the course of a decisive 8-0 victory.

Williams fared worse against a much stronger Trinity-Pawling team, falling 3-4 after several hard-fought matches. Coach David Johnson explained that the two squads the j.v. team used (one against each prep school) were approximately equal in ability.

"Had I known how much stronger the Trinity-Pawling team would be, maybe I would have shuffled the squads around a bit," he said. "But if I had, the Trinity squad might not have had such good matches. Rolling over a kid 3-0 doesn't do anyone a lot of good."

Johnson laid more emphasis on letting the j.v. players play matches than on winning, noting the relative inexperience of his team. The determination of several players showed, however, that they play j.v. squash with full intent to win.

Sometime coach Brad Hunt '90, playing third against Trinity-Pawling, fought back from a 2-0 deficit to win his

New problems plague Pine Cobble development

by Damon Hemmerdinger

Despite stabilization efforts in the fall, slope movement continues at the college's Pine Cobble faculty housing development. Currently, the ground is frozen, which has slowed soil motion.

"We're not sure if the earlier solution worked," Assistant Director of Buildings and Grounds Antonio Janairo said. "The cold weather has reduced movement. It's a matter of time before we're sure."

In September, geotechnical engineers from the construction firm of Goldberg, Zoino and Associates recommended installing a series of finger drains along the active upper slope. These small perforated pipes were designed to move water away from the hillslope as rapidly as possible.

"The first plan seemed to have flaws," Assistant Director of Buildings and Grounds John Holden said. "The consultants came back in November and December. They did borings and are monitoring movement."

The extreme cold which hit the Williamstown area in late November and December slowed work and led to an extremely thick layer of frozen ground. Frost is currently three to four feet deep in some places, according to Holden.

Slip planes

The data does indicate, though, that the ground movement extends further below the surface than was previously believed. Slumps of this kind move along rotational "slip planes." Associate Professor of Geology David Dethier said that the slip surface is about 28 feet below the surface, only two feet above bedrock. In addition to the cold, movement may have slowed because it has been extremely dry since mid-November.

"There haven't been many events that

The Pine Cobble faculty housing development faces further problems due to landslides and difficulties in saving wetlands. (Thomas) have added water," Dethier said. "Whether it's because the late fall and early winter have been dry or because the upper regolith [soil] is frozen, there's been less water. That may have contributed to the ground's slowing down."

The geotechnical consultants are expected to propose a solution soon after the spring thaw. Proposals might include a retaining wall to hold the hill, more wells or drains to move water away from the slide area, or re-routing the road.

"We believe it's a solvable problem," Holden said. "I don't yet know if it's the budget back."

"The telling tale will be when the frost leaves the ground," Williamstown Conservation Commission Chairman Harold Brozman said. "I just hope the precautions are sufficient."

Slope activity spreads

Potentially more worrying for builders than further movement on this part of the hillslope is the spread of sliding activity. "The main slide on the upper hillslope extended to the south in late October," Dethier said. This area almost doubled the length of activity to about 750 feet. No finger drains have been installed on this new slide.

Moreover, other parts of the hillslope are becoming active. It was thought that the original slide occurred because the right of way for the road was cut especially deeply into a particularly steep part of the hill. It seems now that the soil is losing cohesion as a result of rain, heavy machinery and land clearing.

Another set of problems for the college's construction crews is the presence of several wetland areas at the base of the hill. Massachusetts law requires that steps be taken to ensure that construction will not damage or destroy existing wetlands, unless the wetlands are moved and duplicated elsewhere.

"The problem has not really been solved. Work continues to this date. The mitigation effects have been considerably mitigated, though," Janairo said. "We do have two growing seasons to reestablish 75 percent growth."

Three wetland areas originally existed. Two are at the bottom of Pine Cobble Road. The southern area by the entrance to the development has been enlarged to compensate for the destruction of the neighboring area. The third area is across North Hoosac Street.

"The wetland area they are trying to save between North Hoosac Street and the railroad will have a lot of trouble," Dethier said. "There's so much sediment coming off the mountain."

Deans warn students on pre-frosh drinking

by Linda Good

Amid the pile of mail which accumulated in S.U. boxes over winter break, freshmen and junior advisors found a letter warning against the potential problems which might arise when prospective student visitors encounter alcohol.

The letter, compiled by Dean of Freshmen William Darrow, Acting Director of Admissions Tom Parker and Assistant Director of Admissions Fran Lapidus, emphasized the need for caution and communication between host and prospective.

Darrow stressed that no particular event this year prompted the writing of the letter. "Accounts of past years' incidents made all of us want to move early. We're in a very serious situation when we have non-students here, as far as providing them medical help, as far as notifying parents."

"I think it is inescapable that some freshmen and prospectives think this will be one big party," he continued. "One student told me that he had never seen so much drugs and alcohol as he had seen his prospective weekend. He hasn't seen nearly that much, however, since he came here."

"I think that if anyone's going to be a host, then he needs to be completely aware of what his prospective wants to do," Katie Parker '93 said. "If he wants to drink and he's underage, then that's a problem."

Peer pressure

"I have received criticism about the line [in the letter] which reads, 'Any form of peer pressure to abuse alcohol conveys an image of Williams that is simply not true.' I didn't mean to imply

Prospectives not allowed

Many prospectives encounter scenes like this while visiting Williams, a fact which many college administrators regret and are attempting to change. (Thomas)

by that statement that I was naive," Darrow said. "I have heard many students say that it is much, much worse during the prospective weekend."

"I think the letter is common sense," Ivan Yen '93 said. "When I was here as a prospective, I saw a lot of alcohol, but I thought it was normal because it's college."

"Things are much tamer this year compared to my freshman year," Ryan Schneider '91, president of the Purple Key Society, said. "Then, prospectives were in the infirmary, and even in the hospital."

"The Purple Key does its best to match prospectives and hosts who share similar interests, but we also don't like to make the kind of decision that says this student shouldn't stay with that student for whatever reason."

Schneider also said that Purple Key

Teach for America comes to Williams

by Dan Silverman

Teach for America is a private program that will train and send college graduates to teach in inner city and rural areas with chronic teacher shortages starting next year. A chapter of the program is being formed at Williams.

Alison Bonner '92 was asked by the Williams Student Activities Council to represent the college at a December meeting at Princeton University to learn about the Teach for America program and how to establish a chapter at Williams.

Bonner was one of 160 students from 100 colleges who attended the convention. Lectures, group discussions and special panels composed of young inner city students helped delegates form plans to persuade seniors to commit at least two years to teaching after graduation.

"Teach for America is trying to reach everyone on campus and explain the terrible situation in American public education," Bonner said.

Thesis sparks program

Teach for America was the idea behind the senior thesis of 1989 Princeton graduate Wendy Kopp. Her plan was to attract outstanding college graduates who could, without a major in education, teach in public schools in areas such as Los Angeles, New York City, the Rio Grande Valley in Texas and rural North Carolina, where young and talented teachers are a rare commodity.

Kopp's professor liked the thesis but insisted the idea was impractical. Upon graduating, however, Kopp and others gathered private support from corporations like Union Carbide, Xerox and Mobil and public endorsement in the form of agreements with public school systems to accept teachers trained by Teach for America.

College graduates accepted into the program will go to Los Angeles this summer for an eight-week intensive course and will be teaching, with the support of a mentor teacher, in elementary and high schools around the nation this fall. Salaries range from $19,000 to $29,000. Participants are also able to defer payment on student loans under the provisions of the Higher Education Act of 1983.

Bonner, with the help of Jen Plinsky '92 and Assistant Dean of the College Andrew Hernandez, has made plans to spark Williams' interest in the Teach for America program. Literature has been made available in the Office of Career Counseling, and a campus-wide mailing will be delivered soon. Bonner said she also hopes to register with the College Council to make Teach for America an officially recognized campus group.

Minority groups add support

Campus groups like the Black Student Union, VISTA, ASIA and the Jewish Association are working with Teach for America to help recruit minority and bilingual participants into the program.

"Thirty percent of all public school students are minorities and only five percent of their teachers are," Bonner said. "There are very few role models for young minority students. The language gap is becoming a major barrier between teachers and students in many areas of the country."

Bonner and others also noted the need for more younger, energetic teachers as the current teaching pool grows older and the population of school age children increases.

"I think the time is now for a program like this," Hernandez said. "With the expected big increase in the number of kids going to be in school, there's going to be a real need for the Williams kind of student to teach. Plus, younger teachers

Why Winter Study must stay

Every year about this time, one starts to hear murmurs of discontent among the faculty about the Winter Study program at Williams. Professors, it seems, are laboring away to provide serious but enjoyable courses, while students are more concerned with Nintendo games, pro football and nightly keg parties. Without the fear of a bad grade hanging over their heads, students are apt to relax their academic standards significantly, foregoing a day's reading for a trip to Brodie Mountain.

The faculty's concerns are valid. What is the point in teaching a course to students who are entirely unwilling to put forth any effort? Anyone would be frustrated in meeting blank stares every time a question was asked in class. Many teachers feel it would be a good idea to do away with Winter Study altogether.

They say that an extra three weeks in January would enable them to catch up on individual research, while students could watch television and drink beer in the comfort of their own homes. The long vacation would provide an opportunity to get a job and earn some spending money for those students who were so inclined. Wesleyan University is one school currently using such a calendar.

To eliminate Winter Study, however, would be a grievous error. It is unfortunate that many students do not take their courses seriously, and there is no excuse for their actions. For many others, though, Winter Study is a chance to explore a particular area much more seriously than is possible during the semester.

Each year, a number of students work on individual research, many in the natural sciences. Those considering careers as chemists or mathematicians have an opportunity to pursue the kind of creative work not feasible in a regular course. The fact that they are offered academic credit for this work makes it much more appealing than it would be if the winter term were optional.

Other students choose to explore areas in which they have much less experience. Performance classes are a prime example of this, giving students from all disciplines the chance to spend a month putting together a play, recital or portfolio without the distractions of four other courses. Again, the academic credit and the absence of a grade other than "pass" or "fail" make the option an appealing one.

Another important part of Winter Study is the very issue that appears to be misunderstood by both professors and students -- namely, the opportunity for relaxation and socializing. For students to spend a month revelling in the pursuit of pleasure is a waste of everyone's time. For faculty members to claim that recreation should not be a part of Winter Study, however, is also regrettable.

Skiing and watching television should never take priority over academics. During January, however, students should appreciate the opportunity to engage in both activities. The regular semester is stressful, exhausting and downright unhealthy at times. Students need a chance to look around and enjoy the facets of Williams that disappear under the pressure of papers and exams. Winter Study should not represent a choice between recreation and academics, but an opportunity to explore the best of both worlds.

To the editor:

Three pictures of "tables" were included in the Baxter display sponsored by Students Organized Against Racism. One showed a group of white students sitting together. Another showed black students sitting together. The third picture was of a group of Asian students sitting together.

I am one of those Asian students in the picture. I am sitting with three of my friends. They happen to be Asian. I am writing on behalf of my friends and myself.

This photo was used by the photographer, Eric Chiu, without our consent. We were not informed that our photo would be used in this display. When I spoke to Chiu, he admitted that he had purposely taken the photo to represent us as an "Asian table" on campus. He also admitted that the photo had probably been used and interpreted out of context.

Further, Chiu deliberately misinformed us at the time he was taking the photo. Since the four of us knew him vaguely and on more or less friendly terms, we did not try to stop him when he asked to take our photograph for his own "personal collection." I spoke to him shortly after I learned that this photo was on display. He does not deny that he obtained and used the photo improperly.

My friends and I have asked that the photo be removed from the display and to the best of my knowledge, it has been removed. We have also asked for a written apology from Eric Chiu and that has been posted in the Baxter display. SOAR has assured us that they had no knowledge that we were not asked permission to use the photo in the display and that they certainly had no idea that we were deceived by the photographer in the first place.

We wonder if Chiu ever stopped to consider the damage that could be done with this photo in this context. It could simply be a picture of some friends sitting together. It could also just as easily be interpreted as an "Asian table."

The incident has made us more conscious and self-conscious. We wonder how many other people see us sitting with our friends, some of whom are Asian, and think that they see some sort of an Asian "gang." All of a sudden we are not individuals and friends but a faceless minority group.

We hope that this is not the type of thinking that goes on around here. We hope that Chiu acts more responsibly.

Jesup does poorly by IBM users

To the editor:

I would like to applaud Robert Weisberg's article in the last Record criticizing the computer center for the shabby service it offers those who use it, particularly IBM users. Weisberg made a point that needed to be made now for quite some time.

Before voicing my reasons for agreeing with Weisberg, I would like to take issue only with his complaint that IBM machines no longer provide users with boot-up disks. Although the presence of boot-up disks was nice while it lasted, I believe that the computer center was justified in requiring IBM users to create their own. As one computer center student aide told me, the all too frequent theft of boot-up disks were costing Jesup far too much in terms of both time and money.

But Weisberg hits the nail on the head with regard to everything else. The all-night basement provides those who use IBM personal systems -- i.e., the vast majority of IBM users -- with absolutely no computers on which to work. This is especially unfair in light of the fact that the same basement provides Macintosh users with around ten Macintosh computers.

Just why the computer center gives this unfair advantage to Mac users gives us a very real and complete failure. It is a complete mystery. To exclude users of Zenith, Hyundai, or even AT&T is one thing; but to exclude users of IBM is simply inexcusable.

Regarding the laser printers for the IBMs, I say without exaggeration that there has not been a single instance since September in which I have used the IBM laser printer in Jesup 208 without running into some sort of major problem. Toward the beginning of the semester, paper jams presented an ever-recurring dilemma. Toward the middle of the semester, unfashionable black streaks down the sides and middle of my papers were all too frequent. Toward the end of the semester, toner shortages and complete failure to operate seemed to occur almost daily at 4:45, 15 minutes before most final papers were due. Just a few days ago, I found out that there is another laser printer for IBMs in the Bubble. When I asked to use it, I found out that -- believe it or not -- it "just doesn't work." Problems such as these have forced me, for example, to send off summer job applications having a quality of appearance inferior to that of a hastily made xeroxed copy. Considering that IBM is used by hundreds of students, not to mention the Record and the Observer, the fact that there are only two laser printers on the entire campus for IBM users, neither of which work very well at all, is outrageous and intolerable.

Williams College is an expensive commodity, but I and hundreds of other IBM users have decided to purchase it for approximately $75,000. For this money, I do not think it unreasonable to ask for one or two more higher quality IBM laser printers on campus. Weisberg claims that laser printers are, admittedly, expensive. But expensive is a relative term. A $3000 laser printer is certainly expensive for one student. But considering that the college will milk $18,995 from each student this year and expects to wheedle $150 million more from alumni by 1993, it can hardly be said that two more laser printers would place a strain on the college's budget. And if it does, well hell! The college can always raise our tuition next year!

Episcopal bishop to speak Jan. 17

To the editor:

I would like to bring to the attention of the Williams community an important event that will be taking place this week. On Wednesday evening, January 17, at 7:00 p.m., the Rt. Rev. Andrew F. Wiseman, Episcopal bishop of the diocese of Western Massachusetts, will speak in the living room of Dodd House on the subject of Christian-Jewish relations. Students are also invited to join Bishop Wiseman for dinner in the Gibson Room of Dodd at 6:00 p.m., immediately preceding his address.

Bishop Wiseman has long been recognized as a leading authority within the Church on this topic, recently taking a sabbatical from his ecclesiastical duties to devote himself to further study of the subject.

Everyone in the Williams community is warmly invited to take part in what is certain to be an enlightening and enjoyable evening.

Lost in space?

Quayle's plan leaves room for debate

by Tom Dupree

In a speech to astronomers on Wednesday, Vice President Dan Quayle discussed plans for the United States space program. The occasion was the 175th meeting of the American Astronomical Society, held in Crystal City, Virginia.

In his address, Quayle reaffirmed the need for space exploration and research, while simultaneously cutting related costs. "Our competitive advantage in technology has disappeared," he said. "Our programs seem to be taking too long and costing too much."

The remedy he proposes is for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration to seek assistance from sources outside the agency itself: research centers, universities and private industry.

Quayle seems convinced that this will reduce the cost of space exploration, although exactly why and how this will occur is unclear. If enlisting outside help is intended to break up the monopoly NASA holds on the space industry, why isn't the same medicine prescribed for other federal agencies with costs perceived as exorbitant and unnecessary?

On the other hand, if NASA has sought to execute its missions at the lowest possible cost (as ideally it should), wouldn't simply scaling back future exploration be the wisest alternative? Quayle wants to have it both ways -- extensive research and exploration at reduced cost.

Calling on private firms and schools is not the answer, not because such a policy wouldn't be effective from an economic standpoint, but because the cost of financing missions would still be borne by the federal government. The best solution is to pool the resources of the international scientific community by expanding cooperation with other nations, possibly Japan and the Soviet Union. Quayle, who serves as head of the White House's National Space Council, has said the council will discuss this possibility at a later date, though the odds of it being well received appear slim.

Moons? On Mars? Today, the space program is one of the most visible symbols of American patriotism, and, as such, a request for international assistance may be seen by many as a sign that America has fallen behind, that we are not the Quayle is a convincing speaker, at least when he has a script.

The problem is that space exploration and patriotism are inextricably linked in the minds of the American public. The entire concept of the "space race" reflects a sense of competition: which nation will be the first to plant its flag on the scientific leaders we used to be. The inherent irony in this debate is that outer space knows no national boundaries, though we are rapidly trying to create them through the use of spy satellites and the like. Instead of taking a strategic attitude towards space exploration, we should emphasize any potential military benefits (which are far fetched in and of themselves), just as we should downplay the "we were there first" attitude.

Not only do new discoveries benefit all nations, but the costs are spread out as well. Experts have placed the cost of a mission to Mars at $400 billion. Is it worth it for the United States to foot this exorbitant bill purely to reassert our national superiority in the sciences? Or would it be wiser to split the cost among several nations, breaking down divisive patriotic barriers at the same time?

Quayle has said he wants a new approach to funding the space program. His speech reinforced this belief, and was well received by the audience, which applauded periodically throughout the duration. Despite his crises, Quayle is a convincing speaker, at least when he has a script. Although he refused to take questions at the end and although he did beat a hasty retreat through the side door, many were nonetheless impressed by his performance.

If, as he suggested, expanding international cooperation is presently discussed within the National Space Council, the issue of patriotic allegiance versus scientific advancement will no doubt rise to the surface. Our priorities must be acknowledged; is it worth paying twice or three times as much just to be able to say we did it ourselves? In addition, the role of NASA must be clarified. Is it, and should it be, a monopoly? And, more importantly, is the continuation and improvement of the space program primarily a national goal or a scientific one? If we wish to continue exploration within budgetary limits, these questions must be answered.

Computer center changes need careful study

by Evan R. Moore

As a student who has enjoyed a very close association with the staff and students of the computer center, and worked for them often, I feel compelled to respond to the opinion piece which ran in the January 9 issue of the Record. While Mr. Weisberg raises very good philosophical points about the purpose of facilities at Williams and how they should be managed, he does not seem to have fully thought out the human and policy issues involved in his experience.

As he admits, the standard hours for Jesup set 6 p.m. as the closing time on Saturday, and 11:30 a.m. as the opening time on Sunday. It would be wonderful if the computer center were open more on the weekend, but it is constrained by personnel limits.

The only people who are available to work in Jesup from Friday night until Sunday evening are students. While I am sure there are some students willing to work on a Saturday night during the normal semester, they are under the same pressures as every other student during the end of term. Asking them to work extra hours during the Crunch is unreasonable.

In addition, the computer center does not have the staff resources to make the sort of commitment. Computer center policy requires a staff member to be present during all late-night shifts. The one nighttime operator which Jesup does have worked consecutive 15-hour nights last year in order to provide 24-hour access to Jesup. If the student body really wants Jesup open 24 hours a day, we should lobby the administration to provide more staff resources to Jesup in order to provide that service.

Somewhat separate from this point were the concerns about the all-night computer area in the basement. Do not think it is a pleasant place to study or work (I it is pleasant to hear from people who feel that it is). However, the computer center has never made significant numbers of machines available in an unsupervised environment. This is simple loss minimization. Computers do get stolen, and it is easier to walk into the basement of Jesup at 4 a.m. and walk out with the computer you have always wanted than it is to walk past the Bubble with a machine tucked under your arm.

However, the computer center is flexible. No IBM machines of any kind were available in the 24-hour area until this year, but the work of the College Council made it clear that the student body wanted them and they got them. If the student body as a whole rejects the idea that computers must be supervised, then it should lobby the computer center to change its policies. Then we could have all of Jesup as a 24-hour area, as Mr. Weisberg suggests.

A possible compromise on this issue might be to post security personnel of some form at the door during the hours which Jesup is currently closed. This would provide protection from theft and greatly increase the number and quality of resources available to late night students. The down side of this idea is the absence of student workers to help with problems or check out programs. Since this is already the situation in the 24-hour area, I think it is a limitation with which the student body can live.

The complaint about lack of PC support among the student workers is somewhat justified. The computer center does not train its Computer Center Consultants more on the Macintosh than the PC, but the students who apply for the job tend to come with more Macintosh experience than PC experience.

To rectify this imbalance would require a concerted effort on the part of the staff and student workers, an effort which would absorb several of the weekly one-hour training sessions which CCCs attend. This would correspondingly reduce the amount of time for teaching them other skills. The CCCs have to do a lot, and devoting that much time to PCs would be a major commitment. Again, if the students want it that much, we should actively lobby for it.

In any event, if you ever feel a CCC has not met the standards of professionalism and training you feel he or she should, it is your right both to ask for staff assistance and to ask for the staff supervisor of the CCCs and lodge a complaint. I do not want to sound Draconian, but the center's commitment to eliminating workers who consistently fail to meet reasonable competency expectations.

Mr. Weisberg's final comments on laser printers touch on the most troublesome issue in his entire piece. There is no right to laser printing. Most other colleges charge per page for laser printing; Williams is rather unique in not doing so. This is why the one copy rule is so important, as he acknowledges.

Since there is a laser printer in the physics computer area which is usually readily available, along with the several in Jesup, I think there is a large capacity for laser printing already available. In addition, I have never heard of any professor requiring papers to be laser printed. Jesup is full of quick serviceable pin printers (Imagewriter and Okidatas), and while their use requires different procedures than in years past, everyone has had an entire semester to learn them.

If there is such a strong consensus on the desirability of laser printing, the economics involved will have to be better understood than it currently is. Several universities and colleges have done studies trying to determine how much it costs per page printed on both laser printers and dot matrix printers when the costs of purchase, maintenance and supplies are considered over long time periods. The results have been inconclusive.

Williams has not yet conducted such a study, and I would like to see it done. If the results indicate that laser printing is not that much more expensive than dot matrix printing, then more laser printers should definitely be worked into the public facilities in the near future instead of adding pin printers. I do not propose wholesale abandonment or replacement of the current pin printers. I would just like to see more informed decisions made when planning new purchases.

The academic computing division of the computer center has undergone what I can only describe as a massive personnel turnover in the last year. At the start of 1989, Academic Computing consisted of seven people, one of which was a temporary employee. At the end it consisted of six people, only three of whom were there at the start. One of the people who left was Dennis Aebensold, the director of the group. This means the academic staff has been and will continue to be under great pressure to carry out their mission without enough people, and without a central planner.

Given all of this, I would urge the student body to think about the human aspect of running the computer center. The Record opinion piece voiced some reasonable concerns which should probably be pursued. However, if they are going to be realized, we have to be willing to recognize the constraints and make compromises.

College continues recreation program

by Navin Girishankar

The Williams College Athletic Department will continue its Community Recreation Program for residents of Williamstown this year. The program's participants may use the gymnasium, squash courts and swimming pool only on Sundays for the remainder of the academic year.

"The program is designed for everyone outside of the college who lives in Williamstown," Assistant Director of Athletics Gary Guerin said.

The program, which started last spring, has been successful in catching the attention of Williamstown residents.

"I think the response we received this year has been great," Guerin said. "Last year the program got going a little bit late so the response was a little bit lower. The program is designed to get the community members into the college on Sunday days at a time when it would be best for everyone. The program, in my opinion, is a very good one. It allows an opportunity for people to bring over their families on a Sunday afternoon to take them for a swim during the winter months."

"People asked to continue the program this year," he said. "We were hoping to begin the program in September. There are a number of reasons why we didn't, but we got the program going after the Christmas break. It's going to run through May 6th."

Registration doubled

The registration for this year's program has more than doubled over last year's effort. Guerin said that 180 residents signed up to participate.

Residents can participate in the program for a registration fee of $5 per family and $2 per individual member. The fee mostly covers the administrative costs associated with the program.

The recreation program was the brainchild of Guerin and Director of Athletics Robert Peck, who is on leave this year. "Bob Peck felt that it would be a good idea," Guerin said. "Since our facilities are expanded, we could include the community."

There was some concern expressed by Williams students about overcrowding of the facilities. Guerin said, however, that he does not anticipate a problem.

"The way the program's set up, on

Although the Athletic Department will continue its Community Recreation Program, the overcrowded Fitness Center will not be included in it. (Thmas)

Sundays from 4 to 9, it'll hit the dinner time hour in the gyms and allow the people in the community a time when maybe the students aren't quite as involved in the athletic center."

The weight room, which is already overcrowded, is not included in the program. Some Williams students agreed with the program's purpose. Pat Murphy '93, whose family lives in Williamstown, said, "I think it's a good program because the kids in Williamstown have nothing to do at all in terms of activities. They have the Williamstown Youth Center, which is incomparable to the facilities they have here."

In Other Ivory Towers

Tufts University

The cockroaches that infest Carmichael Hall at Tufts University may be imperious to nuclear radiation, but they are about to meet their match in the spray guns of professional exterminators. After roaches were discovered throughout the building before Christmas break, Buildings and Grounds Director Edward Gilbert decided to marshal his forces and launch an all-out war on the six-legged creatures during winter recess. Students, however, seemed non-plussed. One student who found a roach on a silverware dispenser table in the dining hall said, "It's nothing worse than a bad restaurant."

College of San Mateo

The president of the student body at the College of San Mateo has resigned in the wake of a scandal over misappropriated college funds. Christopher Martinez allegedly used his position to buy himself a $34,000 Mercedes and $8,000 in computer equipment, charging it to the school's student government. Signatures of fictitious campus officials were found on documents he used to purchase the car. In addition, Martinez claimed he had the "power of authority" to make the purchase. The college has not paid the bills, and a spokeswoman said that Martinez is no longer a student at the college. He has been arrested on charges of violating the terms of his probation for a conviction of credit-card fraud two years ago.

Trinity College

Junior Jon Stevenson has been declared the winner of The Trinity Tripod's Bad Poetry Contest. The winning (?) entry, according to Stevenson, came from a collection of poetry that earned him a B+ in the ninth grade. As a result of his victory, he has been declared Bad Poet Laureate of Trinity College. The following poem is the one that brought him fame and glory:

"Thought"

Nothing copied.
Hard at work,
Inside one's mind,
Ideas lurk.

Within his head,
Each has his own,
Way of seeking,
Meanings that have grown.

Four granted fellowships in England

by Soojin Kim

Four Williams seniors will pursue B.A. degrees in England for two years following their graduation this June. The Faculty Committee on Graduate Fellowships has awarded Dr. Rachel Smith-Fellowships for study at Emmanuel College in Cambridge to Rachel Teed, Patrick Gilmartin, and Dan Naumowicz. The committee also awarded the Carroll A. Wilson Fellowship to the Dorothy H. Donovan Scholarship for study at Worcester College in Oxford to Rachel Zuckert.

One of the three Smith Fellowships is reserved for science majors, one for arts and humanities majors and one is left open.

According to Teed, the committee had difficulty in finding a suitable applicant for the award reserved for science majors. As a result, Teed, who is a biology major, did not go through the normal selection process.

"Professor Ari asked me to apply after the deadline," she said. "Although competition among arts and humanities students is apparently stiff, many science students go straight on to graduate or medical school."

Warm-blooded dinosaurs? Teed plans to study biology and geology in the B.A. program before pursuing an M.Phil. in Quaternary Research. She said she hopes to hear arguments defending the conservative viewpoints in controversies over whether mass extinctions occurred over the course of evolution and whether dinosaurs were warm-blooded.

In addition to the travel opportunities, it'll be worthwhile to look at these issues in paleontology from a different angle," she said. "I see the scientific community in the U.S. as being more radical."

Teed added that although these fellowships for study abroad were well-advised, she feels that information and students are not readily available for graduate school.

"A small office of graduate studies in OCC (Office of Career Counseling) or run like OCC would be great," she said.

"In the history department the few boxes containing graduate school catalogs are incomplete and out of date. Professors will write you letters of recommendation, but much of their information is likely to date back 10 years."

"I was fortunate in having the opportunity to benefit from the advice and experience of older friends going through the grad school selection process," Teed said.

Zuckert, a philosophy major, said that members of the philosophy department have been very supportive in helping her to decide where she wants to go following graduation.

"I see the upcoming two years at Oxford as time to decide whether I want to pursue an academic career or to do relief work with an international organization like the Red Cross," Zuckert said.

"As opposed to the very evident value of relief work, I sometimes think pursuing an academic career is self-indulgent," she said. "Although I enjoy philosophy, I'm not sure how my scholarly research would benefit society. I suppose philosophy is good for people like us who'll end up living okay lives anyway to the extent that our lives will be reflective rather than non-reflective."

Zuckert wants to pursue a B.A. in politics, philosophy and economics at Oxford. She plans to focus on English philosophy's analytic tradition of describing experience logically.

Gilmartin, a studio art major, will pursue a B.A. in architecture at Cambridge before returning to the U.S. for further study in this area. While in England, he hopes to explore in more depth the efforts of architects like Richard Rogers and James Stirling to reinterpret and adapt the previously ignored heritage of 19th century English industrial architecture.

Naumowicz, a history major, plans to pursue a B.A. in Anglo-Saxon, Norse, and Celtic Studies at Cambridge. While focusing on the history of early Britain, he will continue his study of the Irish language and begin the study of medieval Welsh.

Alternates were English majors Donald MacKinnon and Victoria Szabo, and English and history major Michael Szalay.

Piper discusses subtle discrimination

by Keith Hedlund

Less than a week before the racism workshops sponsored by the College Council were scheduled to begin, noted artist and philosopher Adrian Piper introduced the Williams community to a perspective on "Higher Order Discrimination" at the Williams College Museum of Art.

Piper read from a technically-worded paper she wrote on the subject, and handed out to the audience members pages outlining the philosophical terms she defined in the paper.

She distinguished between two types of discrimination. "A simple first-order discriminator is a blatant and unrepentant racist, sexist, anti-Semitic, homophobic, etc."

"Higher-order discriminators are on the other hand more subtle in their discrimination," she continued. "A higher-order discriminator is characterized by that attitude in which a certain habit of thought poisons his or her judgments."

"Higher-order discriminators may tend to assume that ethnic identity is connected with a certain physical appearance -- for example, that Jews have large noses," she said. "They might consider a woman pushy or forward when in fact she contributes no more to a conversation than anyone else."

She warned that the subtlety of this discrimination should not be ignored.

"Higher order discriminators do not see combatting prejudice as important. That is why we must watch what they do, not what they say."

She also emphasized the value of being able to define the two types of discrimination.

"The distinction illustrates that one need not be a blatant racist to practice political discrimination," she said. "A higher-order discriminator may appear to other discriminators as a prince among men."

"We must watch what they do, not what they say."

men. To disavow, however, he reveals himself as a Mr. Hyde."

In addition, Piper characterized higher-order discrimination as a sickness that needs to be treated, not a vice that needs to be punished.

After she finished reading from her paper, she opened the lecture to questions from the audience. Dylan Tweney '91 questioned the value of presenting the issue from a philosophical perspective in highly technical language. He suggested that tackling discrimination with a more immediately practical sociological study or with a call to action might be more useful.

Piper responded, "Calls to action are fine for the converted, but we need philosophical discourses to establish these categories [of discrimination]."

Self-examination Another audience member asked her whether the purpose of her paper was to call for us to examine ourselves. "We are all discriminators," Piper answered, "and we all need to examine our critical judgments."

Piper, who received her Ph.D. in philosophy from Harvard, recently completed a Woodrow Wilson Center Fellowship in philosophy. She is currently doing art work with the aid of a Guggenheim Fellowship. Most of her art work has been concerned with racial issues and has been exhibited at many well-known museums.

This Saturday an exhibition of twenty of Piper's works, including some of her photo and silkscreen collages and drawings from the series Vanilla Ninja, will open at WCMA.

The lecture was sponsored by the Freshman Winter Study Seminar, "Ethnicity and Identity in America," the Women's Studies program, the Lecture Committee, WCMA, the Afro-American Studies program, and the departments of art and philosophy.

Albion closes up shop in Northampton

by Mary Moule

When zoning restrictions forced Albion Books' Northampton, Massachusetts store from Green Street, the company chose to close down the shop rather than pursue the academic bookstore business which has been so successful in Williamstown.

Albion Books owner James Murphy cited restrictive town policies and hassles with the Smith College administration as reasons for the decision to close down the store on December 1. With a recent change in the parking laws on Green Street, four of eight retail stores have had to close.

"Smith College itself is buying some of the property and turning it into a residential area in conjunction with the city of Northampton's development plans for the downtown area," Murphy said.

A coffee shop The Northampton store was very different from Albion's other bookstores. It housed a coffee shop where students and townspeople gathered. The store dealt mostly in used books, and, according to Murphy, also took textbook orders from some professors. These amounted to about ten percent of book sales.

The administration at Smith encouraged professors to order books from the Smith College Bookstore, which is affiliated with the college. Albion was invited to the area by an independent group of faculty members who preferred to deal with a shop that was not closely tied to the college. Smith administrators resisted the competitive aspect which Albion brought to the area.

"I think there should be a free market and the college shouldn't try to make any money off of the sale of textbooks," Murphy said.

Nevertheless, without college support, the shop was unable to turn much of a profit. When their store could no longer operate on Green Street, they decided to give up the Northampton business. According to Murphy, textbook orders were transferred to the Smith College Bookstore, and the inventory of 25,000 used books will be brought to the Williamstown store.

The Williamstown Albion Bookshop is one of only three remaining in the chain with the closure of the Northampton store, one of the largest in the Albion chain. (Thomas)

"I've never closed anything before, and we were sorry to have to do it," Murphy said. "I do make a good tuna fish sandwich, but our experience at Williams has taught us that we're better at other things."

Murphy noted that the Williams experience has been successful. Last year, the college set up a committee to find a better solution to selling textbooks than the cramped quarters at the old Williams Bookstore. Besides lack of space, long lines and delayed textbook shipments, faculty and students had expressed a preference for an academic bookstore that dealt in trade books. Several options were considered before the administration invited Albion to set up a shop in town.

"It's a new idea, oddly enough," Murphy said. "Williams was unprecedented in arranging to get a college bookstore in return for the textbook revenues. Often, textbook stores will sell T-shirts and other items and leave the academic trade books to other vendors. But without textbook revenues, purely academic stores often cannot make it."

"The [Williams] committee was brave in making a decision that many other schools aren't making," Murphy continued. Now, however, some of these schools are discovering the value of such a solution by examining the store in Williamstown. "Many are considering this option themselves," he said. "College treasurers at other colleges like Williams want one like it."

With this in mind, Albion Books has decided to get out of the food service business in Northampton as part of an effort to focus all of its attention on academic bookstores such as the one in Williamstown. It already operates bookstores in Amherst and Montague as well. Although he declined to discuss specific negotiations with other colleges, Murphy said that they are pending with several institutions.

Meanwhile, the store in Williamstown continues to grow and change. A mural has been painted on the back wall, and there are plans for shelves of used books, tables and a coffee machine in a back corner. Murphy said he hopes to offer more used textbooks as they become more available through his used book dealers. He also encouraged students to sell used books that can be resold in following semesters.

Murphy said that he was happy with the situation in Williamstown. "Williams has a much more sophisticated and honest town/gown relationship than at Smith," he said. He feels that the community has been very accommodating, and that he would like to expand the function of the store.

"I think that the back of the store would be a fascinating place for a performance community center like we have at the Montague store," he said. Plans for such an addition might be complex in terms of dealing with the zoning board, he added.

Beyond the Bubble

Gorbachev works to fight growing nationalism. The tide of unrest and nationalism in Lithuania continues to rise. On Friday nationalist leaders in the Soviet republic rejected a Kremlin proposal to outline new procedures for republics seeking to secede from the Soviet Union, calling it a "propagandist trap."

Meanwhile, Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev has conducted a campaign of personal persuasion across Lithuania this week in order to stop calls for secession until, as he promises, he can help establish a more economically and politically liberal Soviet federation. U.S. officials, meanwhile, are trapped between taking the traditional U.S. position of supporting self-determination and helping to keep Gorbachev in power.

Rumania outlaws Communist Party. In Bucharest, Rumania on Friday afternoon, approximately 5000 demonstrators gathered to mourn the thousands who died in the uprising against former Communist President Nicolae Ceausescu last month. The protesters demanded that the crushed Communist Party be outlawed and that the death penalty, which had been abolished by the new governing Council of National Salvation after the execution of Ceausescu and his wife, be restored. Ion Iliciu, the chairman of the precariously established Council, agreed to outlaw the Communist Party and to hold a nationwide referendum on the death penalty.

No new East German security force. Amid strong opposition by the East German public, Communist Prime Minister Hans Modrow swallowed his plans to form a new security service. Many members of the Parliament, who had endorsed the public's opposition to the new service, suspected that the Communists had staged and combated the neo-Nazi revivals to regain lost political clout. They erupted into applause when he announced the decision.

would like to keep tabs on all prospective students. "The biggest problem we have right now is that many prospectives come on their own without going through us or they come through the athletic program, which is separate from the Purple Key. We want to make sure that we know who is on campus and where at all times."

Darrow said that the instances of alcohol abuse by prospectives were isolated. He nevertheless urged freshmen and JAs to exercise caution at all times.

"I have one simple request. I think everyone ought to think about the power relationship that freshmen have with prospective students, and not abuse your power."

"I do not want to belittle the fact that peer pressure and the relative dominance of the 'keg culture' is always present on campus," Darrow said. "I really believe that the majority of students have trouble with that."

have won," Williams coach Roger Caron said. "If Sean [Rourke] were healthy, we could have beaten Norwich. I'm pleased that no one quit, and that we could be competitive with those types of kids."

Standouts for Williams on the afternoon included Sullivan, who won all three of his matches and recorded two pins, and Faciani and Mawn, each of whom ended the afternoon with sparkling 3-0 records. Felix, sophomore Dylan Bloy (126), and Dreyer each won two of their three individual matches.

A strong early season

This young team, which has only one senior and two juniors on its roster, has excelled all season. On Jan. 9th, the team hosted Albany State, which is ranked 12th in the nation in Division III. Albany State handily defeated Williams 33-8, although Caron said at the score didn't indicate how close many of the individual matches were. Scoring points for Williams were sophomore Chris Gern (150), who won by a decision overpin, and Rourke, who tied Albany's All-American Greg Jones.

Williams dominated its first quad match of the season, defeating all three opponents in a December meet. The team destroyed UMass Boston and Bridgewater State 32-11 and 48-10, respectively, while edging out Plymouth State 24-21.

Wrestling is an up-and-coming sport at Williams. The last time a Williams wrestling team opened its season with three straight wins was in 1958. Last year the team started then season 0-3 and was 2-5 at this point in the season. This year the team is 5-2 overall and feeling confident in its ability to be competitive.

"I am very pleased," Caron said. "But the best wrestling is still ahead." With such a young team, Williams wrestling may be an even stronger force in the future.

The team's next match is the MIT Invitational on January 20.

Sophomore Doug Dreyer strains to break a hold in Saturday's quad meet in Lasell gymnasium. Troll, wrestling in the 190 lb. class, dropped a light decision to his Norwich opponent but posted two wins on the day. (Thomas)

The Harvard team brought their top seeded-player and then only the seventh through fourteenth players on the team.

Although Williams coach Dave Johnson noted that this is not a credit to the squash program, he saw the Harvard match as another learning experience for his team.

"This shows how strong and how deep the Harvard team is," he said. "I'm not offended. It gives the players match experience that they might win."

But winning was not the final outcome for the team. Top seed Bruce Hopper '92 lost his match 9-15, 3-15, 8-15. Second-seeded Andy Clayton, third seed Chris Pentz '91 and number four John Bingham '90 all fared no better, finding themselves on the slim ends of three-game matches.

Junior Rob Illig's fifth seed match gave the Ephmen something to cheer about as he came close to winning his match. After a long struggle, he drew ahead 14-11 in the fifth game, but finally fell to his Harvard opponent 15-13, 7-15, 13-15, 15-9, 16-17.

The Crimson roll

Sieve Buxbaum '90, playing in the sixth slot, was upended in three games. Seventh seed James McLain '93 came closer to tasting victory. His match unraveled late, with a game score of 14-15, 15-6, 15-11, 13-15, 6-15. Eighth seed Henry with a 57-49 triumph.

The balanced Eph scoring attack was led by Vaughan with 15 points, followed by forward Sherman Jones '92 with 14 points and Conte with 12. The Ephmen were much more accurate from the field in the second half, hitting on 13 of their 28 attempts, but they shot a horrendous 47 percent from the charity stripe on the game.

The first half saw the Ephmen running the fast break at every opportunity. "They weren't crashing the offensive boards at all," junior center Than Healy said, "which made it very easy to run. The transition points and Conte's shooting were the reasons we got out on them so quickly."

The Ephmen coasted to victory in the second half, leaving the Union squad at 2-5 on the season. While the Ephmen had a good shooting night from the field, their woes from the free throw line continued, as they sank just four of 16 chances on the game.

Conte, who had been averaging slightly over 10 points per game, led the Ephs with 23 on the night and added four assists. "After the first shot went in I felt good and was in the flow of the game," he said in explanation of his finest shooting effort of the season.

Conce, who had been mired in a small shooting slump, paced the Ephs to a 44-23 halftime advantage with five three-pointers in the first half. As a team, Williams shot 64 percent from beyond the three-point stripe and 49 percent from the field on the game.

The first half saw the Ephmen running the fast break at every opportunity. "They weren't crashing the offensive boards at all," junior center Than Healy said, "which made it very easy to run. The transition points and Conte's shooting were the reasons we got out on them so quickly."

The Ephmen coasted to victory in the second half, leaving the Union squad at 2-5 on the season. While the Ephmen had a good shooting night from the field, their woes from the free throw line continued, as they sank just four of 16 chances on the game.

Conte, who had been averaging slightly over 10 points per game, led the Ephs with 23 on the night and added four assists. "After the first shot went in I felt good and was in the flow of the game," he said in explanation of his finest shooting effort of the season.

Major added 13 points while Williams netted 11 of his own, and this duo also led the team in rebounding with 11 and 10 respectively on the game.

Win over Skidmore

On Saturday night, Williams went on the road again for a matchup with Skidmore, and the Ephmen came away with a 68-60 victory to lift their season mark to 8-1. The backcourt tandem of Major and Conte both shot well from the field again, with the captain netting 14 points in the first half alone.

The Skidmore squad employed a stalling strategy for parts of the contest, slowing the flow of the game and attempting to untrack the Williams offense. But the Ephs hit some clutch shots down the stretch, enabling them to hold on for the eight-point victory.

The 8-1 Williams record will be challenged when the R.P.J. Engineers come into the Purple Valley tonight for an 8:00 contest at Chandler, and the Ephs will journey to Amherst on Saturday for an important showdown with the Lord Jeffs.

Williams runners shine at Dartmouth Relays

by Josh Brumberg

Joining a star-studded field that included such track luminaries as Eamon Coghlin and soon-to-be world record-holder Lynn Jennings, the Williams track team traveled to Hanover last week to enter their second meet of the year, the Dartmouth Relays.

As the meet took place just four days after Winter Break ended, the Eph runners had their work cut out for them if their times were to resemble their hopes. But, by the time the Williams runners headed back to the Purple Valley on January 7th, they left behind a string of outstanding performances.

"The whole team was happy, because it is hard to come back from break and go to a big meet like Dartmouth," senior co-captain Alison Smith said. Smith led a strong sprint corps with a 1:03.25 in the 400m and missed qualifying for ECACs by just one hundredth of a second. Freshman Allison Orsi ran a strong high hurdles in '08.9. Both Hilary Cairns '92 and Anne Platt '91 qualified for the 5000m run at the ECAC championships.

Simon smokes in 500m

At Dartmouth, the Ephmen also tied on their faces and ran some fabulous races. Highlights included the 500m, where Carey Simon '90 won the Open division, Sal Salamone '93 came in third, and sophomore Brad Behr rounded out the top five. Freshman Jeffrey Cooper started his inaugural season by winning his 800m heat.

The mile relay team consisting of Larry

Smith '92, Behr, Simon and Salamone ran a 3:25, a time that was not turned in all last season. Already senior captain Dale Johnson, sophomore Brian Coan, Behr and Jeff Agaro have qualified for the New England championships.

While Dartmouth was the first meet after break, the runners of Williams had kicked off their season on December 2nd at Colgate. Junior Kim Bamdollar ran a 1:02.400m at that meet, but was away for Winter Study. Senior co-captain Susan Gray ran a 2:26 half-mile after a year away from the team.

A bright future?

Senior captain Dale Johnson described this year's team as young and "having a lot of potential." He hopes that the distance squad will carry over their success from the cross country season. This will be hard, for the moment at least, as coach Peter Farwell noted that "a rash of injuries" has led to a lack of depth in many of the distance events.

Johnson said he feels that the only real weakness of the team is its lack of depth in the weight field events. He added that he is hoping more men will join the team to correct this.

Smith highlighted the fact that there are many good freshmen adding a lot of much-needed depth to the team. While Williams has long been known for its tradition of good distance runners, Smith said, "This is the first year where there is an equally strong crop of sprinters."

Next weekend the Eph runners head west to face Union and Hamilton at a tri-meet at Hamilton.

Coach Briggs' ice troops gain a split in Vermont; host Engineers tonight

by Kerr Houston

After a week of intense night practice, the women's hockey team climbed aboard the team bus on Saturday and headed for the hills of Vermont for a pair of contests against Middlebury and the University of Vermont. Although the team fell to a powerful Middlebury squad 4-1, they salvaged a split the next afternoon when they downed UVM 2-0, leaving themselves with a 3-2-1 record as they head into tonight's showdown with R.P.J.

According to senior wing Kathy Lapey, it was hardly an ideal contingent that pulled into Middlebury for a Saturday duel with the Panthers, who had already handed the Ephwomen their only loss of the year.

"Half of us were sick," Lapey said, "and we were all rather paranoid. We went in sort of fearing them."

However, the team turned in one of its finest efforts of the year, as the Williams defense, spearheaded by the sparkling play of Nathalie Weicker '91 and net-minder Sue Pichler '90 (29 saves), held the Panthers scoreless through one period.

Although Middlebury lit up the scoreboard in the second stanza, tri-captain Kara Lynch '90 soon knotted the score at one with a tally assisted by fellow tri-captain Jill Magnuson '90. The Panthers, however, continued to attack and went on to tickle the Williams nets three more times, eventually skating away with a 4-1 victory.

After an evening in a Vermont hotel, the team headed to Burlington on Sunday for a matinee showdown with UVM. Led once more by the sterling glove hand of Pichler, who turned in her second shutout of the year, and the solid defense of Tamiko Kido '92, the Ephwomen walked away on the fat end of a 2-0 score. In the process, the Williams six overcame a Vermont team that Lapey described as "scrappy, rough, and cheap," and topped their record to a respectable 3-2-1.

Freshman Sharon McGee opened the scoring with a second period goal off a Lynch pass, and then Lynch and Magnuson connected once more, as Lynch bulged the Vermont cage for a 2-0 Williams lead. The pair of goals proved to be quite enough for Pichler, who recorded 19 saves on the afternoon.

Coach James Briggs and his troops will try to extend their modest onetime winning streak as they host R.P.J. tonight at 7:30.

Road losses to Westfield State and Middlebury for women's hoop team

Williams showed that although it is a young team, it is capable of running together under pressure and running plays smoothly, once it gets in synch offensively.

The next two games for the women were away contests, the first a Thursday showdown at Westfield State where the Ephwomen suffered a 73-60 loss. Westfield had just come off a win against second-ranked Bridgewater State, so it was obvious that they were going to be tough opponents. The visiting Ephwomen turned in strong offensive and defensive performances, keeping right with Westfield throughout. The game was tied until the last five minutes when Williams broke down offensively, giving Westfield the opportunity to ice the win.

Panthers roar to win

The team's third game in a week was at Middlebury on Saturday January 13, and it ended in a lopsided 72-50 Panther win. From the start, the team was sluggish, according to coach Nancy Roberts. Deensively, several mistakes provided Middlebury with ample opportunities to score.

The visiting Ephwomen turned in strong offensive performances.

Middlebury had just come off a three-game trip to California over the holidays and was well-tuned for this game. Middlebury played a 1-3-1 zone trap against Williams, which effectively shut down the Williams offense. From the top, Williams fell behind, with the Panthers roaring to an early 12-4 advantage. The rest of the game saw Williams try to play catch-up, but the Ephwomen never got back into the game. In the second half, Williams went to man-to-man and managed to cut the lead to six, but then Middlebury soon brought its fist down. Despite the loss, however, some of the players did extremely well, according to Roberts. In particular, Meg Brown '91 had a career-high with 18 points and 18 rebounds.

The team plays today at Union, a team that should keep the Ephwomen busy. On Thursday, Williams will face Smith at home, and on Saturday they will climb on the bus for another away game at Amherst. The numerous road trips have been hard on the team, but the Ephwomen have the determination and skill to improve their 2-4 record.

Athlete of the Week

This week's Athlete of the Week is senior Kara Lynch, who led the women's hockey team on a one-day road swing with two goals and an assist. Lynch, one of three team co-captains, scored once against a strong Middlebury squad in a 4-1 loss and then notched a goal and an assist in leading the Ephwomen to a 2-0 win at Vermont. Congrats, Kara, and keep it up!

Last week's answers: three NHL teams (the Chicago Blackhawks, the Detroit Red Wings, and the St. Louis Blues) have nicknames that involve colors; no NBA teams have nicknames involving colors (unless you count the Golden State Warriors, which was also acceptable); the Winnipeg Jets and the New York Jets share a nickname, as do several other pairs of professional teams; Miami downed Alabama in the USF&G Sugar Bowl to end its season at 11-1.

Women's squash

First and second seeds Lisa Brayton '91, and Susan Piper '90, succumbed in three games in their best-of-five matches. Jennifer Thurman '93 handled her opponent somewhat more successfully, fighting her way to a 15-9, 16-13, 6-15, 15-12 victory in the third spot. Senior Timmie Eriksen stretched her opponent to four games before losing 15-11, 7-15, 9-15, 10-15.

Fifth seed Miriam Marcus '91 and ninth seed Abigail Ash fell 1-3 and 0-3, respectively. Christine Forbes '92 playing in the sixth spot, controlled her opponent with relative ease, steering her way to a 3-1 win, as did Christine Olli '90 in the eighth spot. Seventh seed Amanda Crane '91 dominated her match and rounded out an impressive showing by the lower Williams seeds in winning 15-13, 15-8, 15-12.

In an exhibition match, Holly Hedeman '92 potted to a 15-10, 15-7, 15-12 victory. In spite of the team's dissatisfaction with the loss, coach Gail Ramsay was positive about the match and the team's future. "Williams played pretty good squash. It's the first match after a long break. I think we will get stronger and stronger as the season progresses."

The squad will try to do just that in their next match, as they don their road uniforms and head for Hanover today for a showdown at Dartmouth.

Grapplers capture two out of three

Crush Haverford and MIT; season mark stands at 5-2

by Augusto Torres

Last Saturday the Williams wrestling team performed up to its newly raised expectations, beating two of three teams in a quad match held in Lasell Gymnasium. The Eph grapplers defeated MIT 27-18, beat Haverford 48-6 and lost closely to Norwich 20-21.

Norwich, a military academy, was undefeated at the match. MIT topped Haverford, but was overcome by Norwich and Williams. Haverford lost all of its matches.

The Ephmen, heading into the afternoon with a 3-1 record, knew that Norwich posed the greatest challenge of the three opponents. At one point in the match, Williams was leading 20-5, but Norwich relied on its heavier weights and won the last four matches, as Cadeta edged out Williams sophomore Doug Dreffer (190 lbs.) and freshman Sean Rourke (177), who wrestled not only his opponent but also an illness. Juniors Sean Glynn (166) and heavyweight Andy Allen (134) also fell, Allen on a dramatic first-round pin that gave Norwich its first lead of the match and simultaneously catapulted the Cadeta to victory.

Ephwomen defeat shorthanded Mohawk squad

Upset over North Adams State a bright spot in 2-4 season

by Asli Bali

In their first game of the second semester, the women's varsity basketball team claimed their second victory of the season with a huge upset over a powerful North Adams State squad.

Women's hoops

The Ephwomen set up a fast-paced game from the tap, but North Adams was able to meet the pace and maintain their offense throughout the first half. The Williams defense was well coordinated and their zone setup was successful, but it couldn't shut the North Adams women out.

North Adams came to the game with six women, several of whom never came out of the game. Their point guard had the speed and skill to make up for her lack of height, and once North Adams had pulled ahead at the beginning of the first half, she never let up the pace.

The Williams defense forced several Mohawk turnovers. However, bad passes kept them from scoring on these breaks and put the ball right back in the visitors' hands. As North Adams began to press the Ephwomen with their man-to-man defense, tempers ran high. Game play was interrupted at almost every turn by a foul, which broke concentration and kept scoring low.

At the first half the Mohawks enjoyed a 30-17 cushion. With the Ephwomen trailing by 13 points and virtually shut down by the North Adams' defense, the prospects of winning this game seemed dim for Williams. Becca Borden '91, Kris Broadhurst '92, and Kate Sharkey '93 had spearheaded the Williams offense in the first stanza. Williams' main problem offensively in the first half was a weakness on the boards, which was only compounded by difficulties with ball-handling and passing.

In the second half, Williams co-captain Karlyn McNall '90 took charge offensively and gave the team some direction. The Ephwomen started setting up their offense early and got the ball moving.

Williams also began to draw fouls. Five minutes into the second half, North Adams had five fouls to Williams' one, and the Ephwomen had cut the lead to six.

Poor rebounding and missed turnover opportunities continued to plague the Ephwomen, but North Adams, with only six women and still pressing on defense, had to slow the pace and Williams saw its chance to pull ahead.

A pooped Mohawk squad?

North Adams was really beginning to tire, making several careless mistakes by the middle of the second half. With ten minutes of play left, the Ephwomen pulled ahead for the first time in the game. The rest of the second half turned into a game of errors, with both sides fouling and repeatedly losing the ball.

Martha Lucy '91 scored again for Williams, leaving the Mohawks on the slim end of a four-point margin.

With less than four minutes left on the clock, North Adams called a time out and was visibly starting to panic. Within the next minute both Sharkey and Lucy sank baskets, increasing the lead to eight. The North Adams point guard tried to set up their offensive strategy again by slowing down the pace, but she used up the shot clock and the ball came back to Williams.

Ephwomen pull away

With under two minutes left in the game, Mularczyk scored off a rebound, swelling the score to 56-46. Sharkey sank her next shot, and with 35 seconds left in the game, each team had seven fouls and Audrey Mauner '92 went up for two foul shots, hitting both and bringing the score to 60-46. The last seconds of the game saw North Adams struggle to maintain possession of the ball, but the clock ran out before they had another shooting opportunity.

Ephmen working overtime; split a pair of thrillers

Seguin notches three goals in week to lead Williams skaters

by Kevin Greenberg

Sixty minutes was just not enough for the Ephmen last week as Williams split a pair of overtime games with Holy Cross and New England College (NEC). The Ephmen had just righted their record at 4-4 with their 5-4 victory over Holy Cross when NEC (5-8) pulled into Lansing, Chapman rink on Saturday. Williams dominated the game, controlling the puck throughout regulation and taking the lead on a goal by Sean Seguin '91 just 3:20 into the second period.

Chris Headrick '91 had taken the puck behind the net and crossed it to Seguin. Seguin skated out from behind the net and across the crease and backhanded the biscuit over the left shoulder of NEC goaltender Al Dobbin. It was Seguin's third goal of the week and his sixth of the season, leaving him one behind linemate Ron Van Belle '90. Van Belle was in search of his 100th career point after scoring his seventh goal of the season against Holy Cross.

Shutout bid crumbles

The Williams lead held up until the 8:43 mark of the third period. NEC defender Mike Wagstaff got the puck outside the Williams blue line and stepped over the sticks of two Ephmen defenders. He then skated in on goalie Sean Ford '90 and faked a couple of shots, drawing Ford to the ice before lifting the puck over the goalie's outstretched glove.

The game remained deadlocked at 1-1 throughout regulation, but with 2:46 to play in sudden-death overtime, NEC center Bill Engel rushed down the middle of the Williams zone and, from about four yards out, lifted a hard shot over Ford's right shoulder and into the corner of the net to give NEC the win.

"We just have to find a way to get the puck in the net," said Coach Bill Kangas, whose biggest problem was the team's inability to convert any of its six power plays. "If you go zero for six, you get yourself behind the eight ball."

Defenseman Rick Laferriere '91 agreed with his coach. "The trouble is that we couldn't finish off our plays. We had a lot of good opportunities but we just couldn't do it. We held them to only one goal in regulation."

"You are not going to win most games

if you only score one goal," said Kangas, who praised both goals for their excellent net play.

"We played well in their end, but we just couldn't put away our chances," Seguin said.

Seguin sinks Crusaders

Seguin had put away his chances against Holy Cross on January 8. The wing scored two goals, including a regulation backhand and the game winner in overtime. After goals by Van Belle, Dave Bakken '90 and Rob Abel '90 had knotted the score at 4-4 and forced overtime, Seguin got the puck off an unusual face-off situation early in overtime and drove at the Crusader net. But his shot was deflected away. That did not stop Seguin and, with only 11 seconds to play, he put a shot into the Holy Cross net to win the game for Williams. With a game tonight at Middlebury, the Ephmen begin a two-week road trip that will take them to Chicago for a four-team tournament and through Maine for dates with Colby and Bowdoin.

Division I UMass squad sinks Eph swimmers

by Mike Lane

The men's and women's swim teams traveled to the scenic University of Massachusetts at Amherst on Saturday to face the Minutemen (and women) in their toughest dual meet of the season. While the women put up a good fight before falling 164 to 136, the men were given their speedos on a platter and told "Bon Appetit."

UMass is the defending Division I New England champion and grants athletic scholarships to many of its talented aquatic 'ants. The Williams men walked in with a focus on personal performance rather than team score, and with a secondary goal of keeping their pride intact against a squad that was pumped up for a parents' weekend showing. Several Ephs were curious to see these parents, expressing a desire to see who had produced these beasts.

Jordan qualifies for Nationals

The man of the hour was sophomore Greg Jordan. "Big Daddy" swam the vaulted "Iron Cross" and won all three events, recording the only Eph victories in the process. He held off two herculean challengers in the 1000 freestyle to post an impressive 9:55.3 time. Jordan also qualified for nationals in the 200 fly with a smoking 1:56.6. He defeated the defending Division I champion in the 500 freestyle with a 4:49.2. Inspired by the swims, Ephwomen captain Michelle Freemer '90 exclaimed, "I'll drink to that."

Otherwise, the meet was a long afternoon for the killer seals, who fell 167-75. UMass, led by McIver, Kennedy, Ladd and freshman Peluso, had too many stud horses for the Ephs to take on. On the individual level, several season bests were recorded, and diver

Drew Ades '92 threw a 3.0 degree of difficulty dive to receive a standing ovation from the crowd.

Ephwomen plic upset bid

The women's competition was much closer. It was clear that the ladies could and would challenge the intimidating UMass squad. They drew first blood in the medley relay, when Dore Lebeau '91, Ulla Pitha '93, Liz 'give me a' Hickey '93 and Carrie Curtis '93 necked to a 1:55.8. Young Miss Pitha continued her tradition of fresh-burger excellence, chalking up victories in the 100 and 200 breast with times of 1:11.6 and 2:34.2.

Once again the divers proved to be the Ephettes' secret weapon. Even though their main gun was sick at home, the high-flying ladies dominated their opponents and twice brought the team within striking distance of the Minutewomen. Diver Kathia "Tan" Vandevenne '91 dominated both boards. Vandevenne, tag-teaming with co-captain Ashley Clarey '91 and Beth Worley '90, swept the one meter board, and Vandevenne and Clarey went one-two on the three meter.

Though threatened with several diver-led rallies, the UMass women, led by the muscular Billy Idol look-alike Leary, finally wore the Ephwomen down. The meet seemed in fact a moral victory for the young and relatively inexperienced Williams squad. At this meet the women proved to themselves that they can swim with any team in New England.

"I'm very happy with today's results," Clarey said. "The fans were great - when we did well it seemed to have an intoxicating effect on the crowd."

The Ephs' next meet is Saturday at home against Hamilton.

Hoopsters at 8-1 after five straight victories

by Jeff Merritt

On the strength of five consecutive victories, including three in the past week, the Williams men's basketball team is off to its finest start in over 20 seasons. After a comeback triumph at home over Swarthmore and road wins over Union getting off a good shot. The Ephs forced 14 first half turnovers, enabling them to hold the deficit to just three points at halftime.

Williams captain and scoring leader Garcia Major '90 was able to play after an injury to his hamstring the night before, but was kept off the scoreboard in the first 20 minutes and seemed to be playing at less than full strength.

Men's hoops

and Skidmore, the Ephmen possess an impressive 8-1 mark.

Swarthmore came to Chandler on Sunday, January 7 with a 4-6 record. But after taking an early 1-0 lead, the Ephmen trailed in the game for over 25 minutes, primarily because of a horrible shooting effort for the first 20 minutes. The Ephs were as cold as a January morning in the Berkshires in the first half, shooting only 25 percent from the field in converting just seven of their 28 field goal attempts. The Ephmen were able to keep the game close through their work on the defensive end of the floor. While Swarthmore shot over 50 percent from the field and was perfect from the free throw line in the first half, the Williams defense frequently prevented them from Ephmen regain lead Swarthmore maintained the advantage for the first five minutes of the second half, but a three-point bomb from Major followed by a Rich Williams '90 jumper gave the Ephmen their first lead since the early stages at 33-32. Minutes later, down again by a point at 34-33, the Ephs took the lead for good after a steal by Williams at halfcourt. The senior guard flipped a behind-the-back pass to sophomore John Conte who scored on a drive to the hoop.

This began a 13-4 Williams run, backed by seven points from forward Lindsey Vaughan '92, which left the score at 46-38 with less than five minutes remaining in the game. The Ephs maintained that eight-point margin in the final minutes, sending the Williams faithful home happy

"It would be a great gain for the college if the older dormitories could be heated by steam and made generally more attractive. The use of stoves in the rooms, with the incessant carrying of coal and ashes up and down the stairs incident to this, makes the entries untidy and often offensive. A rough boy will be encouraged to negligence and even carelessness by the disorderly state of the entries. A boy entering college from a refined home, but compelled by limited means to take a room in one of these old buildings, may easily become homesick from the very character of his surroundings."

The 1901 President's Report

Housing at Williams has always been a contentious issue, particularly over the last few years. The residential house system that was adopted as part of the transition from the fraternity years, while a success in many aspects, is still ridden with flaws. Student opinion on the system has generally tended to be a variable tide of sorts, with almost seasonal ebbs and flows.

The Insider examines a number of housing issues at the college: house unity, the recent and projected dorm renovations, co-op and off-campus housing, and changes in housing and affiliations policies. The centerfold presents an amalgamation of historical pot-pourri.

Finally, Dean of Housing Andrew Hernandez speaks his mind on a variety of issues in an interview with the Insider.

*"Upon thy thick rough walls the storms have beat
A century and more; thou standest firm.
The generations come and for a term
Live 'neath thy roof, and then with hurrying feet
Pass by forever. But for every one
Who in the past has found a home in thee,
And for the countless students yet to be
Whom thou shalt shelter from the rain and sun,
We love thee, old West College."*

House Unity: Chasing a Dream?

by Tony Ellison

When fraternities were banned at Williams in 1962, a residential housing system was established in the hope that it would allow for a more pluralistic campus while at the same time preserving the residential unity of the Greek houses. But the price of a more varied social environment has been the stereotyping of housing groups at Williams. It isn't unusual to hear about the Berkshire Quad as a vortex of eccentricity; or of Mission 'beer brutes'; or the Row Hicc with their own eclectic mix. These images have considerable staying power.

Contrary to popular expectation, however, those dorms with well-defined images are not necessarily unified. In many cases, the image presented outside the house is not representative of the large majority of its residents. Often, according to some students, many of whom asked not to be identified, it is merely the identity of a house's so-called 'ruling minority' as perceived by the other segments of campus.

One Currier resident described the social situation there as a tense balance of power between two factions. "Only half of the house typically turns up for snacks, depending on who's in power."

"The active ruling clique"

This "house-officer dominance" appears to be a fairly widespread phenomenon in campus housing. Kristin Trost '90, former president of Dodd House, said there is a "core group" of 30 of about 110 residents as regulars at all house functions, ranging from Thursday night parties and cleanup to snacks. She added that there were many difficulties in attempting to unify such a large house; specifically, she cited diversity and apathy as major obstacles.

Steve Scoville '91, a Dodd resident, described his own attitude toward snacks: "Well, if I happen to be walking in Dodd at the time, I'll stop in and see if they have Oreos or whatever, but otherwise..."

A similar situation exists in the Berkshire Quad, according to some. Prospect house manager Jay Hartley '90 spoke of his sophomore year in glowing terms -- "People were transferring in, it was such a cool house!" -- and credited the house spirit of that year to a "critical mass of interested people" and energetic house officers. However, he subsequently added, "The dorm wasn't really that unified. It was just an active ruling clique."

One radical solution to intrahouse divisions between officers' groups and other residents has been undertaken in A-Gar-Wood. Derek Schilling '92, a resident of Wood House, said there had been a lot of dissension among the three houses -- Agard, Garfield and Wood -- in the group with regard to dues and administrative issues. The deadlock was resolved, he said, by granting complete financial autonomy and independent government for each subunit.

Schilling attributed the split to political and personal differences. He said he believed that Agard's "keg-orientation" and willingness to finance parties resulted in a "free-rider" problem of drinkers who had not paid dues.

Such disputes are hardly unusual among the row houses, according to John Putnam '90, former president of Spencer-Brooks-West. Unity fluctuates with different house administrations, he said. But he added that the generally successful retention of Spencer residents indicated some basic house unity.

"It's a place where you live for three years, so there's something there," he said.

Similarly, Schilling said that there was great unity within Wood itself, emphasizing the "academically-devoted" atmosphere and amity in everyday activities. "It does actually feel as though you're living in a house."

Many observers would say that the Mission Houses are the most cohesive of any on campus. Stein Soelberg '91, president of Armstrong, attributed his house's "extreme unity" to sophomore homogeneity. "Sophomores who want to live in the Park don't have the urge to go to Greylock every night or look for peace and quiet," he said.

He added that a large segment of last year's Williams D and Morgan East entries were currently living in Armstrong, thus providing a "stable base" for house organization. He said, "It helps that they already know each other, but it's not cliquey at all."

Kent Wosepka '92 of Armstrong agreed. "If there's one thing we have in common, it's partying."

Residents of the Greylock Quad identified strong unity in their houses as well. Gladden House president Paul Dehmel '91 said that interconnecting suites and the house's policy of "keg-matching" -- purchasing an additional keg for each one purchased by house residents -- were extremely conducive to social intercourse.

"People here just like to have parties, and that really unifies the house," he said. Dehmel made a distinction between "living-room parties" behind closed doors and larger "landing parties," which he encouraged as opportunities for interaction between the mix of age groups living in Gladden.

The physical structure of some dorms actually works against house unity. Hartley bemoaned the "lack of hallways to hang out in" at Prospect, while Trost mentioned Dodd's satellite-oriented setup as yet another obstacle to social coherence.

On the other hand, Liz Borowsky '90 of Tyler found that its relative isolation led to a greater degree of cohesiveness.

"It's so much more convenient to hang out in the dorm, because [everything else] is so far away otherwise." She said she appreciated several house activities at Tyler like midnight sledding and Tuesday night board games, saying they offered welcome diversions at the far corner of campus.

Entry unity

Freshman entries share with upperclass houses many of the problems of residential unity. However, entries also have particular concerns that put a slightly different bent on the issue of dorm cohesiveness. Physical setup and personal attitudes combine to create a unique social atmosphere for each entry. Borowsky, a former Lehman junior advisor, said the location and layout of the dorm allowed for more entry unity than the freshman quad, for instance, "where it's easy to bop from entry to entry." Jon Gray '90, a JA last year in Morgan East, described Morgan entries as being "unified within themselves" but not with the entire dorm, primarily on account of the large size and physical separation of the entries. He added, "People just coming in have a lot in common automatically."

One student from the freshman quad disagreed. He said that his entry's initial unity, based as it was on "fear, necessity and innocence," had long since evaporated. In the aftermath of the initial adjustment, he said that he now had serious complaints regarding the maturity level of entrymates and the role of JAs, whom he considered responsible for ensuring entry congeniality. He added that he spent most of his time at other entries.

JAs and house officers have significant roles in promoting community spirit. Hartley described voluntary house work as "a draining process. You've got to be about inhuman -- out of control. Then everybody's really psyched and you've got a great house!"

Club, Euro and classic rock

Some of the greatest problems in attempting to achieve a measure of residential unity revolve around the sheer diversity of house residents. For instance, Trost remarked that the diversity of music tastes at Dodd were a constant problem in planning social events. She said that coordinating tastes that ranged from New York club and Euro to classic rock proved particularly difficult at dance parties. She added that the house was characterized by "diversity to the point of antagonism."

Alcohol is an especially divisive issue in some houses. On a campus that where alcohol plays an often-critical role in social life, non-drinkers can suffer from a certain residential marginalization. "Only the blind and ignorant say that [alcoholic functions] fragment; you can't deny that it's something to unify, by value of interaction," Gray said.

But other students are not quite so unequivocal in their support. One non-drinker who wished to remain anonymous said, "I don't think there is any one answer you can give to this. If you look at it, drinking does unify the house to a certain extent, but you can't ignore the other side. In a sense, drinking isolates the non-drinker."

Pat Bentley '92 questioned the need for unity at all.

"House unity seems like such a silly thing, because it's just people in the same house, who obviously aren't going to get along with everybody," she said.

Now, however, housing officials have said nently successful in this capacity. The questions that must be asked, however, concern the repercussions of such socialization. Ultimately, in a campus that is increasingly more sensitive to problems of gender-oriented marginalization, sexism and heterosexism, the single-sex entry may be rapidly becoming an anachronism.

A brief history of Housing at Williams

Historical background and other information obtained from Williamsiana.

"Each room is provided with the essential articles of furniture, such as desk, chairs, table, bed, and chiffonier, but the student is expected to supply his own rugs, mattress, pillows, linen, and blankets. The buildings are heated from a central heating plant, are lighted by electricity, and have ample bath and toilet conveniences. The room charge includes heat and attendance, but light is extra."
Course Catalog 1927

In 1974-75, the row houses were all single-sex.

Carter House was the last to be co-educated.

Fayerweather Hall was originally named South Hall.

In 1798, students residing in East College were charged a dollar each quarter for room rent. In addition, the Trustees at that time voted to require students to supply their own firewood to heat their classrooms. If a student failed to bring the wood, the expenses were added to the term bills.

Houses moved with times

by Sallie Han

In the Berkshires, the mountains may not move but the houses do. House movements have played a major role in the shaping of Williams College.

Dodd House was the Williams Inn until 1974, when the Inn moved to its present location and the college took over its main house and its annexes to use as student housing. The building was originally Professor Cyrus Dodd's home,
Netherleigh, in the late 1800's.

Dodd is now surrounded by small satellite houses. Interestingly, however, this has not always been the case.

In 1846, Parsons House stood on the corner of Spring and Main streets, where Morgan Hall stands today. The college bought the property from Thomas Mole and moved the house to a site west of Dodd in 1882.

Goodrich House was originally Professor Leverett Mears' house and stood on the southeast corner of Spring and Main streets. In 1886, when Lasell Gymnasium was built, the house was moved near Dodd. It was used for faculty housing until 1981.

Sewall House was located off Main Street and occupied by Reverend A.C.
Sewall, a Williams graduate and a pastor of the Congregational Church from 1872 to 1886. It was moved in 1905 when Berkshire (now Fitch) Hall was built.

Mark Hopkins' house was built in 1872, after his retirement, on the site now occupied by Chapin Hall. The house was moved in 1910. The house was renamed in honor of Mrs. Mark Hopkins, Mary Hubbell, in 1974.

Horse-driven house

Woodridge House was moved about 30 yards northwest of its original location on the corner of Park and Main streets to its present site behind the faculty club in 1938. The house, which was 80 years old at the time of its move, was conveniently placed out of the way to make room for the faculty club. The house was set on rollers and dragged along by a horse.

According to the Record, May 3, 1938,
"Leon Leete, foreman in charge of the job, admits the task appears gigantic, but claims it actually is as easy as rolling off a log."

Moved off-campus

The Sigma Phi house picked up and left,
too, heading west to Albany.

The Sigma Phi fraternity occupied a brick house on Spring Street from 1857 to 1871. One wall of this house still stands today, as a wall in the Images Cinema building. Sigma Phi then moved to a house on the Morgan Hall site. This house was moved in 1883 to where Sawyer Library now stands. On January 7, 1893, the house burned down.

A second house was built and completed in June 1895. A Williams graduate and Sigma Phi brother had devised a plan to preserve parts of the Van Rensselaer Manor House, which was built in 1765 and had fallen into disrepair, and build a house for Sigma Phi. The stone and timber of the house were brought from Albany.

Legend had it that one of the wings of the mansion was sent to the Smithsonian Institution and that the rest was reconstructed as Sigma Phi Place. Although this story has been proved false, legends like this die hard and are much more fun to believe.

In 1973, the house was moved back to Albany. It was torn down to make way for Sawyer Library. An Albany physician, D.
Joseph Demis, had portions of the exterior facade removed. The decorative stone was sent to Albany where, in the late 1970's, the house was reconstructed. Again.

Hernandez discusses housing

Assistant Dean of the College and Dean of Housing Andrew Hernandez was interviewed for the Insider by Rajesh Swaminathan.

INSIDER: What are some of the major changes in the housing system, especially with regard to affiliations and room picks?

HERNANDEZ: OK, those have not been made. There hasn't been any major changes right now. The Committee on Undergraduate Life is actually meeting today. Sanand, Lon Troyer, Rebecca Borden, and Kristin Trost have all been working since late last semester on developing a housing handbook, which we're trying to get regulations together in a handbook that we'd give out to students. Some of the stuff that hasn't been worked out yet, we're just going to have to work [it] out with house presidents...stuff [like] pulling up squatters' rights, pick-swaps...those have not been decided upon yet. It's going to be based on what kind of information we get from the houses on how they want to do it and then we'll try to come to some consensus.

But it's going to be a process that has to happen real soon and myself and Mr. McEvoy [Director of Housing] have pretty much relied on Sanand and members of the CUL, who also work on the College Council, to sort of get some consensus among themselves and among students that they consult on how they want to proceed.

We have last year's regulations; many of those probably'll be news, but then there may be some modifications based on how people want to go. We're trying to get each house to write up some rules. Sanand has been talking to people about their views on what happens with pick/swaps and hopefully will present it to us at CUL. So that's sort of where we're at with that.

My sense is that there's going to have to be some compromise here because of the different feelings between some of the houses; for example, the row houses feel that if a sophomore picks ahead of a senior, it impacts negatively on seniors who have been in the house for three years. The Mission houses feel that they have this problem with being a sophomore ghetto and this would be a way to deal with that.

INSIDER: So you wouldn't be able to really project a definite date when a comprehensive handbook will be issued?

HERNANDEZ: Well, it's got to be out soon. I thought it would be ready sometime this week, but apparently there're some issues that still haven't been resolved; because we have to get to a printer, and then...distribute [it] among the campus. The deadlines for co-op and off-campus housing are [in] early February, so we want to have that stuff available as soon as we look at that and see what the story is and make some decisions based on it, especially for co-ops; that's a lottery and it's pretty popular.

INSIDER: What is the college policy with regard to permitting students to live off-campus? Have there been any changes? Will there be any projected changes in the near future?

HERNANDEZ: The policy, as I understand it, 8/ The Insider January 23, 1990 is that people apply with a form that we give out, and the Dean's Office reserves the right to not allow a student to go off-campus, based on disciplinary record, etc.

The controversy has been over the absolute numbers that we allow to go off and how it impacts on housing in town. It became an issue with some members of the Town Planning Committee last year.

On the application itself though, (apparently it's been this way since before I was here), there's always been a little sentence in the paragraph saying that if the numbers exceed [our expectations], we reserve the right to have a lottery. Apparently there's never been a lottery, but it's always been on the form. Copies of all these forms are going to be in that handbook.

INSIDER: A lot of students actually feel that the policy is unfair and grossly inadequate in scope, and that it generally reflects an unwillingness on the part of the Dean's Office in particular to facilitate student residence off-campus. [Would you like to comment on this?]

and going off-campus is not a right, it's a privilege. When you come to Williams, we house people on campus. Historically, we've let a hundred or so people live off campus, who've mostly been seniors.

I've only been here for a year; all I can tell you is what I've been told by my predecessor, that the college is in a situation with the community where it has to maintain a harmonious relationship with the town...there's been an issue, particularly in the last couple of years, about affordable housing in Williamstown.

There's been some talk about our students, because landlords can charge them more money, take up housing that would be affordable housing. There's pros and cons to that argument. I don't know how many people want to live on Hoxsey Street and there are traditional houses on Hoxsey Street.

But there's been a question over the last couple of years, because apparently Thomas Street's been used; more houses on North Street are being rented to students, Cole Avenue; there's houses on some other side streets as well this year. So that has become a community issue about what is affordable rent in Williamstown; are landlords renting to students more now because they'd get more money for it?

The bottom line is that the college is a primarily residential college and students are normally required to live on campus.

INSIDER: Do you see any possibility that off-campus [and/or] co-op housing will be allowed to increase in the near future?

HERNANDEZ: Possibly. I think a [lot] is going to depend on the cost of either having housing on campus that is currently not used by students [and] converting it to co-op style arrangements, or purchasing property that is somewhere near the campus or on the border of the campus. A lot of those costs are things that have to be considered if we're going to expand.

Right now, most of our buildings on campus are either residence houses or faculty offices and classroom space. I don't see any current buildings that might be easily converted; they'd need some work and they'd also have to understand that...obviously it's going to be hard to take buildings meant for office space and convert them into co-ops.

Some of the faculty apartments that are around, there's a problem; there's a need for more faculty housing too. And that's a factor in all this off-campus stuff. Faculty, junior faculty in particular, coming to Williamstown, can't afford to buy a house right away, if at all. If we get to a certain number that we only have x number of faculty housing in town, we can't house all the faculty.

It gets to the point where, in some situations, faculty and students are competing for housing in the town, and we need to deal with the faculty housing problem as well as the student housing issues. So any moves we make in both of those directions have to be done considering each; and I think it takes some planning and it takes some time, and it takes financial resources. So I think those kind of issues are going to take a while before they're resolved. But I would support an increase in co-op housing.

INSIDER: Would you feel that the growing numbers of off-campus student residences

have contributed to the decline of town-gown relationships, as alleged by some Williamstown residents?

HERNANDEZ: I don't know. I haven't been here long enough. I've been here for a year. I don't know what it was like five years ago. I don't know what it was like ten years ago. [I can] only judge based on what I've read in The Advocate and the local newspapers and the concerns raised by town members when we have Town-Gown Relations Committee meetings, where this has been expressed; and apparently, this was expressed at other town meetings that I was not at, which college representatives were. So it seems to me that it is an issue right now and the college is having to look at that issue.

I don't know what I see out there. It's hard to tell. There are some very vocal people in the community; I don't know if they represent the whole town, but they're very vocal about their feelings. And the college has to deal with them because they are very vocal, and some of them are landlords, actually, in town, as well, who do or do not rent to students depending on what they feel like doing at the time.

INSIDER: The sophomore ghettoization of Mission Park has been viewed with concern by a growing number of students. Do you have any opinion on this [development]?

HERNANDEZ: Well, sophomores tend to pick Mission Park because they can live in larger groups. I don't think anybody's forcing them to live down there, because a lot of them pick it. And unfortunately, what happens is, sophomores who affiliate with some of the more popular row houses or other houses sometimes get lumped out of those houses, and because seniors and some juniors who don't want to live in Mission Park and do everything they can to get out of Mission Park, the only bed-space left available for people who get bumped has become Mission Park.

So I'm not sure how to change that, except to encourage more upperclass students to live in Mission Park...we were hoping by renovating the building and making it more attractive that older students might be willing to live down there.

INSIDER: With the large Class of 1992, there have been rumors that there is going to be a new dorm. Would you like to comment on that?

HERNANDEZ: Rumors. Right now, as far as I know, there are no plans to construct another dorm.

Happier housing and handbooks

Changes made in housing system

by Linda Good

For the past few years the housing system at Williams has been plagued by confusion and controversy. There have been no concrete and well-publicized rules for students to follow.

With this in mind, a Joint Housing Committee with members from the College Council and the Committee on Undergraduate Life will distribute a housing handbook to every student this February. They hope that this handbook will serve as the authority on the system for at least the next five years.

"Nothing is set in stone, but continuity is the most important thing," College Council president Sanand Raghunandan '90 said. Raghunandan serves also as co-chair of the joint housing committee with Assistant Dean of the College Andrew Hernandez.

"Basically we're just trying to make the whole process easier," he said. "In the past it's just been total stress, where no one knows what's going on and everyone's sort of paranoid that they're missing out on some way to get into the house they want and that someone's always got the upper hand on them."

Included in the handbook are a number of changes, as well as some movement back to the way things were in the past. Major areas addressed are off-campus applications, co-ops, transfer of affiliations, pick swaps, room draw and house elections.

Off-campus approval

To eliminate confusion the handbook clearly states one already existing rule: Students must apply for college approval to live off-campus. The college has denied some requests in the past when too many students submit applications.

"People just haven't realized that the college has to give them the right to live off-campus," Raghunandan said. "People are getting leases further and further ahead of time and when senior year rolls around, they're finding they can't live off-campus."

He also mentioned a lottery system which few students know exists.

"Empty beds on campus cost the college money. If there are more students who want to live off-campus than can, they will have a lottery system in February [after the applications deadline]. As the year goes on and more spaces open up [off-campus] there can be a second lottery. This system has always been there, but has never had to be used before."

The deadline for applications to live off-campus next year is February 16. Applications for co-ops are due February 9.

Living in co-ops has become solely a senior privilege in the handbook. According to Raghunandan, there are only 60 spots available and demand is already amazing. "Because of this we think seniors should have this privilege only," he said.

'In the past it's just been total stress where no one knows what's going on.'

change. "I think we should give the students of this college the benefit of the doubt for handling the transfer process fairly," he said. "We need to move toward more student responsibility rather than dumping it in the hands of the administration."

Transfer process changes

One of the more controversial changes in the housing rules concerned room swaps. The power to oversee the process moved from the house presidents into the collective hands of the Dean's Office, the housing office, the president of the Housing Committee and the College Council president. Raghunandan explained the reason for the change.

"In the past, house presidents were taking too many students into a particular house. That way a lot of freshmen would be bumped. The housing office would give guidelines, but quite often the house president wouldn't follow them. This allowed for a lot of corruption within the system."

Evan Driscoll '91, the president of Perry House last year, wasn't sure that such a transfer of power was the most logical idea.

"In my experience, house presidents are more able to accurately gauge who's leaving and who's staying without having to bump people. I know it's been the status quo to bump fresh-

The options

According to Raghunandan, a number of possible ways to regulate pick-swapping were considered. One idea was to retain class status in a swap. However, this could lead to disproportionate class representation in each of the houses and increased bumping of sophomores. Another option was to have a student who swapped automatically pick with the class below.

The option finally accepted was that if one swapped picks, one also swapped status. If a sophomore trades with a senior, the senior picks as a sophomore and vice-versa.

"I agree with this completely. The motion to retain the same status would hurt the row houses ation will pick with the other seniors in the new house rather than picking in a transfer category.

House elections

Another major change was made in the area of house elections. The new rules went into effect

'We seem to be getting a more coherent, more equitable system.'

last semester and elections were held December 3.

According to the rules, votes for positions with two or more nominees are to be conducted by written ballot. A College Council representative must act as election officer and oversee the election process in each house. The election officer counts all ballots and handles grievances.

"We had a close election in our house, and it was helpful to have paper ballots instead of different people coming up with different counts of hands," Polly Lebaron '90, last year's president of Mark Hopkins, said.

"It was probably easier for other people to vote but it was really a hassle to run, especially with run-offs," former Dodd House president Kristin Trost '90 said. "We were counting the votes and letting people know the results so they could run for other positions. It was much easier when we just counted hands."

Written nominations for house president must now be submitted 48 hours in advance. It was felt that too often students took on the position of house president unaware of the responsibility involved.

"I think it's a good idea [to have written nominations]," Lebaron said. "Sometimes people just jump right in at the last minute without really thinking about whether they want it or not."

"People ran because nobody else ran or because it looked good on their resume," Trost said. "[The house presidents] felt that by having people submit nominations ahead of time and forcing them to think about it, they would take the position more seriously and hopefully they would have spoken to other house presidents to find out what it's all about."

Integrating frosh

Another change in the works is the possibility of affiliating freshmen with upperclassmen houses. The hope is that such an affiliation would better integrate the new class into college life. That idea is still tentative and will not be included in the housing handbook.

"I'm a big fan of that," McElvain said. "The current system has freshmen segregated with lack of interaction with upperclassmen. That's a bad thing."

Reception of the handbook changes has been generally favorable.

Former Perry House president Andrew Munzer '90 said, "So far it looks like a step in the right direction. We seem to be getting a more coherent, more equitable system."

"Overall we haven't made that many changes," Raghunandan said. "Having the handbook will make it easier. We've kept flexibility and eliminated confusion, our ultimate goal."

men from Greylock. But I don't think the system was that bad last year. The housing office also doesn't know about swaps, which the house presidents can gauge more accurately.

"It is hard," he added. "There are going to be some sacrifices and no one's always going to come out smiling." Joel McElvain '91, who represents Gladden House on the College Council, was also wary of the possible benefits of the Administration and seniors regard off-campus and co-ops favorably

by Sara Dubow

After three years of slumber constantly interrupted by late night football games and bi-weekly servings of tofu pie, many seniors decide that the downsides of dorm life are beginning to outweigh the comfort and ease of not having to cook or clean for themselves. They venture off-campus to seek housing or apply to live in a college-owned co-op.

Students must apply for permission to live off-campus. Most students who apply are usually granted this privilege. This year, there are 127 students living off-campus, an unusually high number, according to housing secretary Linda Brown.

The average number of seniors living off-campus is around 100. "There are more empty beds on campus than we like," she said of this year's situation.

Opting for co-ops

While many seniors move off-campus and into their own apartments, the co-ops, which are owned by the college, appear to be the favorite alternative housing option for seniors. This year, 59 of the 60 available beds are filled.

"Every year that we've had co-ops, the beds have been filled," Brown said. "We always have at least triple the number of people who want to live in co-ops than we have beds. In 1988-89, we had 219 people apply for 60 beds. That was the highest."

When a senior moves into a co-op, he or she is still dealing with the college as landlord. As a result, there are certain benefits, such as furnishings and fire alarm systems, which other off-campus housing options do not offer.

There are six college-owned co-ops (Dewey, Doughty, Goodrich, Lambert, Milham and Susie Hopkins). Students living in co-ops pay the same room fee to the college as people who live on campus and can choose to be put on a seven-meal board plan.

"Co-ops are very popular," Assistant Dean of the College Andrew Hernandez said. "I think that is an area that the college needs to look at as a possible place to expand housing. There's obviously a demand there. People want to live in different types of living arrangements, where they don't have to depend on Dining Services. To me, that makes sense; if you're older, you want to do that."

Winning the lottery

Because living in a co-op is so popular, students wonder if there is a way to figure out how to beat the odds and get one.

"It's a total lottery," Hernandez said. "It's a public lottery. We get the applications, we number them randomly and then we just do it in that order."

Hernandez said that there is no truth to the persistent rumor that former junior advisors are usually very lucky in the co-op lottery.

"There's no way we ever push JAs or anybody else on this form, because we don't know who's a JA on that form. It just has their names; we just rank according to the lottery, according to the random number assigned to that form."

He said that one of the important differences between co-ops and other off-campus housing is one of town-gown relations.

"For co-op housing, we [the college] are the landlords and for off-campus housing we're not. The off-campus issue becomes one of town-gown relations. I know students like to live off-campus. I think maybe the college needs to look down the road at constructing on-campus apartments that we would be the landlords of."

Town-gown relations

While off-campus housing is always on the agenda for the Town-Gown Liaison Committee, it has not proven to be a big issue this year, according to Director of Public Information and committee member Jim Kolesar.

"In the beginning of this academic year I called some residents on Hoxsey Street to see how they were feeling about it and got a large range of answers," he said. "Some people said, 'What noise?' Some said that there was some noise, but that it was to be expected. Some complained of occasional incidents and some had serious concerns. Almost every year it's the same kind of mixed reactions."

"Off-campus has worked pretty well," Hernandez said. "People have been pretty responsive to our concerns about having parties. It's a different set of rules because they are dealing in a non-college-owned housing arrangement, and if things happen, the person knocking on the door will be a police officer, not a security officer. I'm impressed by the response of the students to that. So far, so good."

Williamstown Chief of Police Mike Kennedy said that there have been a few complaints about noise involving students living on North Street and Meadow Street, but that there has been nothing serious overall.

"When the weather gets warmer, the beer goes down quicker and longer. That's when we get the calls," he said.

Food when you want it

After more than a semester of living on their own, most students said that they were happy with their situations. Nathaniel McVey-Finney '90 lives in Milham House.

"The privacy of living in your own house is great," he said. "Cooking for yourself is a big positive because it's cheaper, there's more variety and when you want to eat, you eat. You aren't tied down to dining hall hours."

John Tuxhill '90, who lives at 295 Cole Avenue, agreed. "The best thing is not having to deal with the dining halls, and being able to cook your own food."

"I personally don't like cooking, but I wanted to live in a co-op so all of my friends could live together," Peggy Callanan '90 of Dewey House said. "If we had lived on campus we would have been split up, but I would have been eating a lot better."

Briar McNutt '90 lives upstairs from Goff's on Spring Street. "The best thing is that it's like having a home," she said. "It's much more private than living in a dorm."

Living off-campus hasn't meant living cut off from campus, according to some seniors.

"I don't feel at all isolated from campus," McVey-Finney said. "If I want to go to a party, I go to a party. I don't even feel that we're really off-campus because we're about two feet from Bronfman."

Not everybody is quite that lucky. "The worst thing is that we live about a mile from campus and biking up here in January can be quite cold," Tuxhill said.

But overall, student opinion regarding co-op and off-campus housing remains positive. If the trends of the past few years are repeated this spring, the housing office may find itself besieged with a record number of applications for both options.

'When the weather gets warmer, the beer goes down quicker. That's when we get the calls.'

'The college needs to look at co-op as a possible place to expand housing.'

Students discuss racism

by Tom Dupree

Williams students argued, discussed and listened to one another's concerns about oppression in a series of College Council-sponsored racism workshops last week. The 11 workshops were held in Driscoll Lounge. Each was attended by 20 to 40 students.

The workshops were organized by the Equity Institute, a non-profit agency based in Amherst, and were brought to Williams by the College Council. Each workshop lasted about three hours, and consisted mainly of open discussion on oppression-related issues of importance to the participating students.

Students were occasionally asked to break up into smaller discussion groups of two or three people, which allowed more intimate discussion of racial, religious and social concerns. Frequently, issues brought up in these smaller groups were mentioned in the subsequent large group discussion. Participants could then mention similar experiences and feelings they shared.

Throughout the workshop, the emphasis was placed on the personal, the emotional and the immediate. Students were encouraged to relate past incidents in which they were the target of oppression and how they chose to deal with them. These incidents tended to involve racial, religious and sexual bigotry.

The workshops were moderated by Travis Tatum, a college professor, and psychologist Marianne Simon, both employed by the Equity Institute. They took turns in leading the discussion and avoided lecturing the students.

Format designed to fit setting
According to Tatum, the workshops' format is standard for most colleges. "Each format is designed to fit the organization. Equity Institute does consultations for both the public and private sector, from businesses to police departments. This was basically an introductory workshop for a college setting."

"We were hired to focus on racism," Simon said. "We tried to provide a social framework in which the issues could be addressed. We want to know what's important to you, then give you a direction in which to respond. We tailor the workshop to the students' needs."

Both Tatum and Simon felt that the workshops were successful in raising important and sometimes confusing racial issues. Simon said the students, for the most part, were eager to contribute their thoughts to the general discussion.

"There are always some people who are very shy in large groups. But we try to be sensitive," she said.

Student reaction to the workshops was generally positive, although not overwhelmingly enthusiastic. "It was a necessary step, an important step," Susan Smith '90 said. "It helped people to define oppression in a broader scope, so people could see how prevalent it really is. It helped people to understand."

"Still, I wish they had asked people to talk about instances in which they were the oppressor," she continued. "Not doing so exonerated us."

Helpful in dealing with racism
"It was effective in that it helped define how to deal with racism," Heather Grace '93 said. "Although I wish there had been more opportunity to [simulate situations], overall it was very good."

Some felt the discussion was not as heated as it could have been. "They weren't very confrontational. But they did provide a comfortable atmosphere in which to talk," Simon Stolzberg '92 said.

"It was a little too non-confrontational," Karen Gray '92 said, "but it was good to learn more constructive ways of dealing with racism."

College Council President Sanand Raghunandan '90 said that some students may have expected too much from the workshop. "The problem is that many students have not participated in such a workshop before. They expect to get a lot out of three hours. They expect to be transformed. We want to use this as a building block to start dialogue. It's just a beginning. We hope to do this every year."

Funding for the workshops was provided by a variety of sources, including the College Council, the Dean's Office, residential houses and many student organizations.

House of Walsh sold

Peter S. Willmott '89, chair of the Executive Committee of the Trustees of Williams College and chair of the college's Third-Century fund-raising drive, has reached a tentative agreement to buy the House of Walsh from James Hunter, the store's owner, according to a January 17 Advocate story.

Hunter bought the House of Walsh in 1982, and originally planned to sell the business after five years. Business was good, however, and Walsh remained open until December 31, 1989, putting the store on the market only after an inventory liquidation sale. Hunter said that he was surprised that no serious offers to buy the store were made considering its history of sales and profit growth every year.

"It was in great shape. I thought some Williams alum would say, 'I'm sick of the rat race in New York. I want to come back to Williamstown,' and take over. But there were no takers," Hunter said in a November 14 interview with the Record.

Apparently, Hunter has found the buyer he was looking for. Willmott told the Advocate that he plans to put up the financial backing for the reopened store, which will be run by a pair of 1985 Williams graduates.

"We're at a very delicate point in our negotiations. I think it's a very nice property," Willmott was quoted as saying in the Advocate. "It's been a factor in Williamstown for many years and if we're successful in buying it we're hopeful of broadening its product line and making it even more attractive for townspeople." Both Hunter and Willmott expressed the hope that the deal would be finalized soon. "I think that unless some totally unforeseen snag pops up we'll probably be able to get this done pretty expeditiously," Hunter said in the Advocate.

Willmott, a former president of Federal Express, was chairman and chief executive of Carson, Pirie, Scott and Co. in Chicago until last year, when the retailer was purchased by P.A. Bergner of Milwaukee, Wisconsin. He now runs his own consulting firm, Willmott Services Incorporated. He also owns a house in Williamstown.

Panel discusses AIDS issues and community repercussions

by Dan Silverman

As part of the effort by the college to draw attention to the issues surrounding the AIDS epidemic, Health Educator Donna Denelli-Hess led a panel discussion on Thursday entitled "AIDS: Living Safe in Dangerous Times."

The panel consisted of Dr. Noel Blagg, an infectious disease specialist at the Berkshire Medical Center who treats AIDS victims, and the Reverend Michael Povey of St. Stephen's Episcopal Church in Pittsfield, who has counseled people with AIDS and their friends and families. Alice Lyons, whose son died of AIDS in Pittsfield last year, and Director of Health Services Dr. James Corkins also participated. The purpose of their discussion was to address some of the issues surrounding the disease: its effects on the body, community and family and the difficulties Americans have had dealing with the epidemic.

"The statements made by the panel members ranged from the cerebral to the visceral," Corkins said. Each participant tried, in their brief opening remarks, to approach the issues at hand and provide information concerning those issues from their own unique perspective.

History, spread of AIDS discussed
Blagg panned through the history and physical nature of the AIDS virus and its spread.

"What we had in 1981 were reports of healthy young people -- mostly gay men and intravenous drug users -- coming down with opportunistic infections, diseases they had no business having," he said.

Blagg also described the shift in the demographics of those people with AIDS. Most people with AIDS in the early 1980s were ages thirty to forty. Today a greater percentage of victims are in their twenties. This is especially alarming because the seven to ten year incubation period of the virus means that most of these victims in their twenties contracted the virus when they were of college age or younger.

"One in five hundred college students is carrying the AIDS virus," Blagg said.

Following Blagg's portion of the discussion, comments from the audience seemed to immediately bring into question the quality and diversity of experience of the panel. Students asked about the role of race and gender in the epidemic and about the losing battle people of color and especially women of color are having with AIDS. Students noted that none of these issues had been mentioned by Blagg and pressured the panel of three white men and one white woman to keep these ideas in mind during the rest of the discussion.

Responsibility and denial
"I am speaking as a concerned pastor and not necessarily as an Episcopalian," Povey said in his opening remarks. He spoke about responsibility and denial when dealing with AIDS and people with AIDS.

"I'm deeply pessimistic about our prospects because of the attitude of denial," he said. "We're very good at sweeping problems underneath the carpet by saying, 'that will never happen to me.'"

Povey also stressed that safe sex can mean more than just using a condom. He described the importance of knowing one's sexual partner, being responsible and having respect for that person.

Lyons told the story of the death of her son from AIDS to a completely silent audience. She described how taking care of her thirty-year-old child in the later stages of his disease was just like when he was a baby. Lyons spoke movingly of the unrelenting pain, the physical disabilities and the dementia her son had experienced just before his death.

"We just had to sit and watch him die," Lyons said.

Lyons has gone public with the story of her son's death despite the fact that he had wanted the family to say he had died of lung cancer.

"The kids, everyone, should know what a horrible death AIDS is," she said. "Be careful. Know your partners. It's a bad

by Mary Moule

On Monday, January 15, the Williams community honored the life and contributions of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. with music, readings and an inspirational message by civil rights activist Reverend C.T. Vivian at an interfaith celebration in Thompson Memorial Chapel.

The ceremony began dramatically as the student group Kusika marched into the chapel. This African/African-American drumming and dance ensemble chanted and danced before forming on stage to sing a spiritual called "Mind on Freedom."

Assistant Professor of History Reginald Hildebrand opened the ceremony by thanking the activists of the civil rights movement.

"Those of us who are the beneficiaries salute those who stood up for slitting down and rode the bus for freedom," he said. "Most of the beneficiaries of their actions are not black. They freed the United States of the racist attitudes that mirrored our democratic ideals."

Hildebrand warned that the struggle is not over and that keeping faith with those activists requires us to find a way out for the homeless, the drug users and the poverty-ridden as well as oppressed minorities. "We must replace the monument of despair with the towering edifice of hope," he said.

Student leads opening prayer
Larry Smith, Jr. '92 then led the congregation in an opening prayer that thanked King for his leadership. He agreed that this nation still has a long way to go. "With the words of Christ and the Bible, we know we will have guidance," Smith said.

Several members of the Williams community participated in readings from the different faiths represented on campus. Sherlock Graham-Haynes '90 of the Baha'i Fellowship read from the Writings of Abdu'l-Baha on unity in diversity.

Anwar Hossain, a Fellow of the Center for Development Economics from Bangladesh, recited from the Holy Qu'ran in Arabic while College Comptroller Saeed A. Mughal provided an English commentary.

These readings were followed by an anthem by the Gospel Choir. Soloist Angelique Feaster '92 and Hec-Sun Hong '90 each led the choir in refrains.

A recorded excerpt from King's "I Have a Dream" speech was followed by further readings, this time representing the Jewish and Christian traditions. Adam

The Williams Record

Stay aware of AIDS

By now, many Williams students must be numb to the many "awareness weeks" that have come down the pike in the last few years. As a result, there must be more than a few students who paid little attention to the AIDS-education-oriented activities of last week. As with racism, homosexuality, alcohol and other topics of past awareness weeks, there is a tendency to confront a problem for as long as it is raised in the community. Then, when the workshops stop, so does the dialogue. AIDS presents a chance for Williams to break this trend. To do this is the responsibility of the entire community: students, faculty, administrators, health officials -- everyone. The Williams College Museum of Art -- not the obvious candidate to increase campus awareness -- has already done an admirable job in helping to make AIDS awareness an issue through hosting the Bryan Weil exhibit and the Gran Fury performance. Though not everyone agrees with Gran Fury's strident style, it is nevertheless evident that they encourage confrontation of the problem.

St. John's Episcopal Church has also taken a surprisingly active role in promoting community awareness of AIDS. The workshops -- two more are to follow -- present repeated opportunities for members of the community to increase their knowledge about AIDS. The fact that these meetings are not one-time events is also a positive step toward keeping the issue in view.

Health Services should take a lesson from St. John's. The pamphlets distributed by the Infirmary contain useful information, but more mailings should follow, perhaps once every month, reminding students of the dangers of AIDS and the importance of safe sex. Williams students have notoriously short memories, especially for administration mailings. The panel sponsored by Health Services should also be used as a springboard for other events aimed at keeping students informed about AIDS. Another panel, emphasizing different aspects of the crisis, would do that effectively. Health Services has a special responsibility to keep the issue in the public eye.

Of course, all of this will be to no avail if the student body does not take an interest in the issue. AIDS should be of special concern to college students, if, as was reported last week, one of every 500 collegians has the disease. That means that, by the law of averages, four Williams students have AIDS. More importantly, every one is at risk in a community where sexual relationships are unrestricted.

Past workshops on racism and alcohol abuse have not been translated into a constant campus dialogue. Let's learn from our past mistakes. Read your mail. Pay attention to the warnings. Don't let AIDS awareness week become another hazy memory.

To the editor:
In her letter to the editor concerning the photograph of the "Asian table," Sallie Han misrepresented my actions in the matter. Specifically, she made several insinuations which I found to be unjustified.

Han implies that I had somehow deliberately "maneuvered" her and her friends into a potentially embarrassing situation. She wrote that: "He does not deny that he obtained and used the photo improperly." I distinctly remember that though I had not denied her accusations in my conversation with her, neither had I made any such admissions to her. Han also wrote: "When I spoke to Chiu, he admitted that he had purposely taken the photo to represent us as an 'Asian table' on campus. He also admitted that the photo had probably been used and interpreted out of context."

In both cases, Han had either deliberately or mistakenly misinterpreted the statements I had made. I did not intend to nor did I admit that I had sought to single them out for representative Asians. I did not tell her that I had either used or interpreted the photograph out of context. I have not made these so-called "admissions" which she claimed.

My purpose in taking the photograph was simply to provoke open and positive discourse concerning the tables in Baxter where groupings of minority students congregate. In particular, I had hoped that it would bring about increased awareness of Asian stereotypes on campus. Han and her friends had just happened to be at the right place at the right time.

To her credit, Han did raise a valid point in her letter -- that I had not obtained their permission in using the photograph. Nevertheless, before I took the photograph, they did not question me about my intentions in doing so. Neither did they pursue the matter afterward. In fact, they had seemed unconcerned about the whole "affair."

However, what bothered Han and her friends about the photograph was not that I had used it without their permission, but that they felt that they were being identified as an "Asian table." They believed that this interpretation of the photograph was "out of context." However, Han did not specify how the "context" was "inappropriate" in this case, aside from the fact that despite the appearance of the table as an "Asian table," she did not want people to see it as an "Asian table."

There had been no captions or signs besides the photograph which identified it as an "Asian table." It was up to the observers to decide for themselves that it was an "Asian table." I find it ridiculous that she could claim that I was somehow responsible for the "misinterpretation" of the photograph.

I have been asked whether it was necessary to take the photograph. Many of the students I have spoken to have expressed the perfectly legitimate view that there is nothing wrong with wanting to sit with your friends, even if they are all members of the same racial group. Unfortunately, this sentiment is not shared by all Williams students. There are individuals here who are uncomfortable with the idea of uni-racial tables, as indicated by the anonymous note posted on the display case which read: "Why do we let these people into our school if they sit together and won't interact with us?"

These individuals obviously feel excluded from the social sphere of the minority tables. The bitterness and anger that these individuals feel should not be neglected because it would eventually lead to greater racial tension. This is precisely why those three photographs of the so-called "white," "black," and "Asian" tables were put up in the SOAR display -- to get those feelings out in the open.

Perhaps Han is unaware of the detrimental effects of her letter. Her unfounded insinuations have misled those who have not been fully informed of the "affair" in its entirety. This Wednesday, an ugly incident erupted in my entry which was the direct consequence of her letter. With her letter as the sole basis of judgment, three of my entry-mates denounced my lack of integrity and my absence of moral character. Though I attempted to justify my actions to them, it was obvious that a published letter to the Record editor carried more weight than my verbal explanations. Based on the ambiguous evidence that she presented in the letter, they condemned me as being "irresponsible" and "inexcusable" in my actions.

I certainly hope that this will not happen again. Han's ambiguous allegations did not properly portray the actual "affair." I hope that in the future she uses more discretion in formulating more accurate accounts. Eric Chiu '93

People in China still struggling

To the editor:
While people here celebrate Christmas in December, people in China celebrate Spring Festival, which, according to the Chinese Lunar calendar, is the first three days of a new year. I can imagine my old grandfather, my busy parents and my skinny younger brother preparing this important traditional festival.

But my heart is heavy. With the world going to a new decade, with democracy winning one battle after another in Eastern Europe, there is a country with its population equal to one quarter of the world's population and its land area ranking third among all countries, still under the control of "armed socialism." That country is China, my motherland.

As a participant in the Tiananmen Affair which happened in Beijing last June, my heart is heavy! We lost a battle we should have won! We yelled in the street, we sat on the Tiananmen Square, we refused to eat after 10 days of hunger strikes until we lost consciousness, we even shed our blood and lives in front of the armed soldiers and charging tanks. But we lost! Why couldn't our blood and lives arouse the people to fight with us against the brutal massacre? How can a bunch of dictators fool over a billion people, when some of them were even shouting, "We want freedom!"

Now I am in the United States, the world champion of democracy, but my heart is heavy. In the drawer of my desk lies a letter from my former schoolmates in Beijing University. It tells me that one of my classmates, the most honest and obedient in that community, is now in jail; that every college student is required to study the speech of Deng Xiaoping, the commander of the June 4 massacre! What another massacre of spirit! I am now I am praying that the light of democracy will come to the last giant fortress of tyranny as soon as possible!

Pressuring South Africa

Boycotting Coca-Cola is not the answer

by Todd Owens

Recent decisions by several colleges, including Mt. Holyoke, Middlebury and Amherst, to ban Coca-Cola from their campuses mark a disappointing trend in the fight to end apartheid in South Africa. The problem with these resolutions is that they completely ignore the facts of Coca-Cola's divestment from South Africa and, previously, the company's efforts to fight apartheid.

Even more disturbing is the satisfaction this boycott seems to bring to students. By choosing Coca-Cola as a convenient (though undeserving) scapegoat, students are doing nothing to end apartheid. Instead, they are easing their own consciences and thus decreasing interest in seeking real solutions to the problem of apartheid.

In 1986, Coca-Cola divested itself completely from South Africa. The move was brought about by pressure in the United States for the divestment of all U.S. companies. Coca-Cola, although originally protesting that its presence in South Africa would be more effective in ending apartheid than would its absence, complied with the mood in the U.S. and sold all of its holdings in South Africa.

Prior to divesting, Coca-Cola was a model company in the fight against apartheid. Like many U.S. companies in South Africa, a majority of its employees were black. Unlike many such companies, it trained and employed blacks for management positions. In addition, Coca-Cola helped independently black businesses and vendors to open their own stores by providing refrigeration and cooling units at below cost. The move allowed the owners to sell juice, milk and other perishables as well as Coca-Cola.

In the process of divestment, Coca-Cola continued its fight to end apartheid by economically empowering and educating the black population. In selling its assets, it tried to improve the economic well-being of its black employees. Coca-Cola sold a wholly-owned bottling plant to black employees, who now own 75 percent of the plant.

The company also established and endowed with $10 million a project to support housing, education and business development within the black community. Titled the Equal Opportunities Foundation, it is governed by black community leaders including Archbishop Desmond Tutu and Dr. Allan Boesak.

Listing the accomplishments of Coca-Cola is not to suggest that boycotting the company's products is without any merit at all. Coca-Cola does still allow its beverages to be sold in South Africa. By continuing the practice, they may, in a fashion, be supporting the white-supremacist government in South Africa. It is arguable, too, that forcing the company to cease sales in South Africa would be a highly visible condemnation of apartheid. The point that none of these boycott movements seem to have considered are the contributions Coca-Cola has made in the fight against apartheid, and whether these have been important or effective. More significantly, none of the boycotts have considered whether the gesture of ending Coca-Cola sales -- like the gesture of divestment -- is worth the economic disruption it will cause to black South Africans.

In the end, it may be decided that a boycott of Coca-Cola is still a legitimate way to fight apartheid. Hopefully not. But either way the issue warrants a fuller consideration and understanding of the situation than the present boycotters have demonstrated.

A more disturbing problem with the boycott of Coca-Cola is that it serves to defray interest in South Africa and the practice of apartheid. For more than three years, U.S. companies have continued with a policy of divestment from South Africa. Since divestment became a national issue, more than half of the U.S. companies with interests in South Africa have pulled out. While divestment has had only questionable impacts on either apartheid or the economy of South Africa, it has undeniably been accompanied by a decreased popular uproar to end apartheid.

A boycott of Coca-Cola may have similar impacts. While its impact on South Africa and apartheid will be only negligible, at best, it will very likely serve to defuse student interest in ending apartheid. By boycotting Coca-Cola, students will have "done their part" and can go on to more pressing concerns with a clear conscience. Thus, boycotting Coca-Cola might serve to decrease public pressure against apartheid.

In deciding to boycott Coca-Cola, all of these issues deserve careful consideration. Thus far, the boycott at a variety of campuses has done little -- perhaps nothing at all -- to end apartheid. Rather, it has served as a conscience-saving, ineffective gesture.

So don't believe everything you hear. The South African government will not end its policies of apartheid because students at Amherst and Mt. Holyoke have considered whether the gesture of ending Coca-Cola sales -- like the gesture of divestment -- is worth the economic disruption it will cause to black South Africans.

In the end, it may be decided that a boycott of Coca-Cola is still a legitimate way to fight apartheid. Hopefully not. But either way the issue warrants a fuller

Fraternities were abolished at Amherst College in 1985, but they seem to be making a comeback among students there. Although the fraternities were forced to move off campus, several have maintained underground chapters close to campus. The largest of these, Theta Delta, has about 50 members. Overall, about 100 Amherst students belong to one of four underground fraternities, with another 45 students pledging this past fall. "Fraternities are definitely getting stronger," said junior David Mehney, president of Psi Upsilon. College president Peter Pooncey called the resurgence of fraternities "very retrograde," but acknowledged that they had the right to the freedom of assembly. Only one of the fraternities is coed, with five females among its 21 members. "There are not as many girls interested as guys," Mehney said. "They don't see it as a thing to do. But the girls that do join have just as much fun as the guys."

The Faculty Senate at the University of Florida is embroiled in controversy over the design of a new official logo for all university stationery. The possibilities include palm trees, the state's outline, the sun, the campus bellowing, the letters "UF," or an alligator -- the school's mascot. Faculty members seem to favor a logo with the university's name or initials in some type of fancy print. They fear the use of an alligator would tie the school too closely to its athletic programs which have been the subject of much criticism from the NCAA. The quest for a new logo has been going on for at least two years, since the discovery that nearly every department had its own logo. "There were so many different alligators doing so many different things on our letterheads," said a university spokesman.

Most parties, dances and concerts at MIT must end before 12:30 a.m. under a new policy established at that school. The rule was established in order to reduce the number of people not affiliated with the school, but who nevertheless attend campus events. Bars in Boston and Cambridge close at 1:00 a.m., and disappointed patrons have shown a tendency to seek out parties on the MIT campus. Although they are usually denied admittance, they often mill about outside, causing security problems, according to Anne Glavin, chief of MIT police. Shots were fired during one such incident last fall, and the school is not eager for a repeat performance.

Court decides on tenure files

by Deirdre Pappalardo

Despite the controversial January 9 Supreme Court decision requiring universities to release relevant tenure files in cases of alleged discrimination, members of the Committee on Appointments and Promotions said the tenure process at Williams will remain largely unaffected.

The decision results from a 1985 case in which untenured economics professor Rosalio Tung sued the Wharton School-University of Pennsylvania for discrimination after she was denied tenure.

According to a recent New York Times article, the Supreme Court's challenge to the confidentiality inherent in the tenure process has created a stir in academic circles. Though significant in fighting discrimination, the Supreme Court ruling has also raised concern that when the protective veil of secrecy is lifted, fear of exposure may cause reviewers to be less candid. Subsequently, tenure evaluations could be less thorough and less effective.

At Williams, however, members of the CAP do not believe the ruling will drastically affect the activities of the committee or the willingness of faculty to serve on it. However, some did express the concern that evaluations could be affected by the decision.

Advantages of decision

The members praised the advantages that the decision will provide minority groups and women. Dean of the Faculty John Reichert pointed out that individuals who believe they are victims of discrimination deserve access to information that would substantiate that belief. "Like other institutions, colleges and universities are not free of individuals or even departments who discriminate, and the government has a responsibility to defend the victims of their discrimination, especially in a tenure decision," said Professor of Art Zarka Filipczak, a member of the CAP.

Darryl Thomson '91, a leader of the Black Student Union, said that such a step is a critical one in the tenure process, and that its effects will have deep significance in how tenure decisions are viewed and carried out.

Appreciation of such effects, though, does not erase the fear that evaluations will suffer. While most CAP members do not believe that peer evaluations at Williams will change dramatically, they voiced concern that outside reviewers may be less candid.

"This is the biggest concern," Reichert said. He explained that while tenured faculty members at the home institutions have a duty to contribute to the tenure process, outside reviewers assist out of a sense of responsibility to the profession. "Such reviewers, who are highly helpful to the process, may not be willing to risk the exposure permitted by this new decision, and thus may be less reluctant to write at all," Reichert said. "People who would not even have access to their own files are now also asked to turn over their right to privacy."

Concern about ruling's effects

Filipczak indicated a strong concern about the effects of this decision on evaluations, and stressed the loss that would ensue if evaluation becomes less candid.

"The recent Supreme Court ruling will have the undeniable benefit of making more data available for tracking down discrimination where it does exist, but we should not underestimate the seriousness of the resultant loss of confidentiality." "Even if this happens in only a small percentage of cases, that will be a significant loss," Filipczak added. "We should not underestimate the seriousness of the resultant loss of confidentiality. Frank evaluations are particularly needed at the top colleges and universities, where even the weakest candidates are often excellent in certain areas of their work." Filipczak also noted the potential domino effect a single tenure decision case might have if files on other faculty are requested. In such situations, challenges to previous measures of confidentiality could ensue.

"For a court case concerning a single tenure decision, not just the assessments of that person but also files on dozens of other faculty are likely to be requested," she said. "Existing evaluations written with the understanding that they would be confidential are no longer protected under disclosure."

Decisions in government's interest

Such concerns, expressed by professors throughout the country, were deemed "speculative" by Justice Blackmun during the trial. The New York Times quoted Blackmun as saying, "Few would deny that ferreting out this kind of invidious discrimination is a great if not compelling government interest."

The concern evidenced by CAP members does not extend to a fear that CAP activities will change. Professor of Biology William Dewitt, also a member of the committee, says that he cannot foresee any change for the process at Williams. He says the only change may be that the decision could cause some uneasiness on the part of evaluators.

Dewitt also did not believe faculty members at Williams would be less willing to contribute to the tenure decision. In particular he did not predict that the members of the faculty would be less likely to volunteer to serve as members for the CAP.

Pace of college divestment in South Africa has slowed down

College Press Service

The number of campuses that have sold off shares in firms that do business in segregationist South Africa has dropped considerably since mid-1986, the Investor Responsibility Research Center reports.

At the height of student protest of South African apartheid in 1985, 32 schools either revised old investment policies or adopted new ones to divest themselves of shares that had an economic interest in South Africa, the Washington, D.C.-based IRRC said.

Since then, the number of schools adopting new investment policies dropped from 29 in 1986 to four in 1989.

Several factors contributed to the drop in divestment activity, including the South African government's decision in mid-1986 to crack down on the flow of information.

"Network news programs were no longer inundated with the graphic pictures of Student activists seem to be the victims of their own success.

But Richard Knight of the Africa Fund, a New York-based anti-apartheid group, says college activists still are pressing for divestment, and, where that has been accomplished, are pushing their schools to drop companies like IBM, Coca-Cola and General Motors that still distribute their products in the country.

white policemen beating black protesters with rubber whips and truncheons that had served so well to focus the U.S. public's attention on the problem of apartheid," the report noted.

Went '92 and Marisa Brett '92 read from The Gates of Prayer in Hebrew and English, while President of the College Francis C. Oakley read selections from the Bible.

These messages were followed with music by the Gospel Keys Family, three brothers from St. Louis, Missouri who performed several gospel songs. The evening's keynote speech followed, as Vivian celebrated the life and contributions of King.

"Martin was a prophet in our own time, and we knew him, and we are the immediate recipients of his vision, his strategic insights," he said. "We're all Martin's people."

movement, he claimed that it revolved around King. "Who made us cry out for new priorities? Who said that this is a sick society? Who encouraged men and women to speak out against racism? Who made us human enough to effectively indict, then change this society?"

"[King] insisted that the solving of human problems was just a matter of compassion," Vivian continued. "Martin gave us a method of solving human problems without violence because he understood the connection between violence and human oppression. Violence is dead as a viable option in the world today, but we just haven't buried it yet."

"Martin King is the greatest social strategist that the world has ever produced. He created every movement in the country. Out of the black movement came the women's movement, the peace movement, the students' movement, the black movement, the brown movement. The black movement, led by Martin, inspired the others."

Vivian then asserted that King's influence continues to be felt today as groups all over the world use non-violent direct action to overthrow oppression. Following Vivian's message, two final blessings were presented by local religious figures. The Reverend Alexander Jamison of the Second Congregational Church in Pittsfield and Associate Chaplain of the College Rabbi Alan Berg each gave closing blessings.

In a final gesture of unity, the entire congregation rose, crossed arms and held hands to sing "We Shall Overcome," the battle cry of the civil rights movement.

Williams confronts AIDS virus

No change in behavior
Corkins questioned in his statement why, if the Williams community has information about AIDS, he does not see the change in behavior one would expect from properly educated people.

"Why do we know what to do and then not do it?" Corkins asked.

Corkins said he thought the physical isolation of Williams and the long incubation period of the AIDS virus made Williams students and people like them feel improperly safe. He also mentioned that people are often not prepared for sexual encounters and find it difficult to ask the right questions and get honest answers.

"I suggest that everyone make a lifetime sexual plan," Corkins said. "And be careful. When you ask your partner questions, remember that people lie through their teeth when there's a fire in their loins."

After a series of questions from the audience Blagg concluded the discussion by saying he was beginning to feel like an oncologist, a cancer specialist. "I'm already tired of watching young people die," he said.

Episcopal church sponsors a series of AIDS-related workshops and lectures

by Navin Girishankar

St. John's Episcopal Church of Williamstown is sponsoring a series of lectures and workshops devoted to exploring the AIDS problem and its ramifications. The program, entitled "A Community Response to AIDS," was arranged when members of the community began to realize the proximity of the AIDS crisis. The church's committee on the series planned three lectures by authorities on the subject.

Each is followed by a workshop open to the community. Those who attend discuss the issues raised in the lectures, express their thoughts and feelings about the AIDS crisis and give suggestions for the community's response. The first workshop, conducted by Eileen Drummond, followed a lecture by Reed Ide. It took place Tuesday, January 16.

"We would like to have workshops that really deal with a lot of the things that come up in the speeches," Drummond said. "When you have a lecture series like this, you haven't had the time to really digest all that's been said."

"AIDS is here. It's here among all of us," she said as she opened the workshop. "It's not out there somewhere. AIDS is giving us a message and we need to respond."

'AIDS is here. It's here among all of us. It's not out there somewhere.'

Drummond stressed the importance of accepting individuals with AIDS as human beings. "We as a community respond to AIDS so that patients and their families feel secure and accepted. I don't want the perception of the disease to be a problem. I think it's something we have to talk about, and we have to start thinking about it not so much as a problem.

Reed Ide brought this out: 'AIDS is not a tragedy; it's an illness.'"

AIDS issues are far-reaching. Other important issues brought up in the workshop included the alienation experienced by the AIDS patients and their families, and the abandonment of patients by their own families.

"It's fear of the alienation, of the abandonment, of the money running out," Drummond said. Workshop participants responded to a wide variety of issues on the subject, voicing their concerns and hoping to calm their fears. "AIDS touches or very soon will touch all of us," Nadine Kalt said. "The most positive response is love. If anything good comes out of AIDS, it may be the ability to make people feel loved and accepted. As we're learning about the disease, we're learning to be more compassionate. That would be a wonderful, gracious gift that God gives us."

Another participant offered the practical advice of visiting area hospitals, asking for patients suffering from AIDS and offering to help them. One of the goals of the workshop was to give the program a theme for direction. Drummond and the other participants had worked with a problem-solving process that would lead them to an effective community response.

"An important step of the process is to identify a statement that we can all respond to in some way so we can come together with a response," Drummond said. "Understanding AIDS, a personal response and a community response should be viewed as equal [steps]," Kalt said.

Gran Fury speaks to students, faculty

by Dan Silverman

Robert Vazquez and Mark Simpson, two members of the New York City based collective of AIDS activists called Gran Fury, visited Williams last Monday and Tuesday. They spoke with students and faculty about their efforts to expose government and social institutions that make people living with AIDS invisible and expendable.

"There is in this country what you can call a disposable population," Vazquez said. "The silence of the U.S. government regarding people with AIDS is deliberate...By definition the U.S. government is committing genocide."

Vazquez and Simpson were invited to speak by Director of the Williams College Museum of Art Linda Shearer. Shearer said that by presenting Gran Fury and the museum's exhibition of "The AIDS Photo Project: Brian Weill," she is trying to help the Williams community to better handle the AIDS crisis.

Gran Fury, named after the model of Plymouth that New York City police use for an undercover car, was formed in 1987. The collective consists of 11 people, mostly of various art backgrounds, who first joined to work on a window installation at the New Museum of Contemporary Art called "Let The Record Show..."

"Now, through visual projects, we seek to inform a broad audience and provoke direct action to end the AIDS crisis," says a Gran Fury brochure.

The collective has produced numerous public projects including posters, stickers, shirts, fliers, printed ads, billboards and bus signs. The group is also planning a three minute video about AIDS for the MTV show Buzz.

An example of one of Gran Fury's sticker campaigns directed towards heterosexual men, "Men Use a Condom or Beat It," and their Benetton-like advertising bus sign, "Kissing Doesn't Kill: Greed and Indifference Do," were reproduced on campus to advertise for their slide presentation.

Gran Fury's visit to Williams was not its usual method of reaching the public. "We normally do the physical production work," Simpson said. "Talking about it is usually left to others. But [Williams] seemed like an interesting audience to address."

Vazquez and Simpson gave a slide presentation at Lawrence Hall on January 15 to show examples of their work and explain what people in the Williams community could do to help the cause of people with AIDS.

On this Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr. Day, Vazquez opened the show by quoting King: "What affects one directly affects all indirectly."

While presenting images of the "Let the Record Show..." window installation from New York City, Simpson read off quotations from various Americans which were included in the window display. The quotations were etched into concrete slabs placed in front of cardboard busts of those quoted.

Simpson recited three of the quotes: "AIDS is God's judgment of a society that does not live by His rules," from Jerry Falwell;

"Everyone detected with AIDS should be tattooed in the upper forearm to protect common needle users, and on the buttocks to prevent the victimization of other homosexuals," from William F. Buckley;

"We used to hate faggots on an emotional basis. Now we have a good reason," from an anonymous surgeon.

Vazquez and Simpson also showed examples of other Gran Fury sticker and poster projects such as the "Read My Lips" same-sex kissing posters and "The Government Has Blood On Its Hands" New York City sticker and red paint handprint campaign.

The slide presentation also included an image of Gran Fury's banner made to span a city street which read "All People With AIDS Are Innocent."

"The banner was made to reach people with the message that AIDS is not a moral issue. It's a health issue...People with AIDS are guilty only of having a disease," Vazquez said.

The slide presentation was followed by questions from the audience. One student asked why Gran Fury didn't expand its operations outside of New York City.

"Everyone has to work within their own community to end the AIDS crisis. I work in New York," Vazquez said. "You do it and produce it in your own town and address your work to the needs of the people in your community."

Beyond the Bubble

Soviet troops open fire on Azerbaijanis

Soviet troops opened fire on Azerbaijani nationalists in Baku, the republic's capital, on Saturday, killing at least three people and injuring more, a spokesman for the nationalist movement said. Tanks smashed through blockades which Azerbaijani nationalists had erected and moved towards the center of the city. Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev said that extremists in Azerbaijan are calling for the republic to secede and become an Islamic state, but that Moscow would do whatever it had to in order to stop the movement. He said that the extremists' position is not supported by "the people." On Friday thousands of Azerbaijanis gathered in front of Communist Party headquarters for the third straight day and demanded for the resignation of the republic's leadership and the removal of Soviet troops.

Mayor Barry caught with cocaine, relinquishes duties

Washington mayor Marion Barry relinquished his duties as chief executive of the nation's capital after a drug bust on Friday revealed him buying and using crack cocaine. An elaborate sting operation staged by city and federal police employed the use of hidden video cameras, a beautiful woman who invited Barry to her hotel room, and a special rescue team which raided the hotel room and arrested Barry and his armed guards. Barry turned over his duties to City Administrator Carol Thompson and is awaiting his trial in February on charges of possession of cocaine. Meanwhile, many have been calling for Jesse Jackson to run for the mayoral position next fall, but his friends say that he will probably pursue plans to host a television talk show.

Bank of New England announces billion-dollar loss

Bank of New England announced Friday that it lost an unprecedented $1.05 billion in 1989, including a loss of $1.2 billion in the year's fourth quarter, supposedly the largest quarterly loss ever for a bank's size. The federal government is expected to issue a cease-and-desist order next week which will require the bank to make management changes and take measures to improve its precarious financial position. The bank is expected to take drastic measures to ensure its survival, but most experts say that the bank's death may be more likely. One official is quoted as saying, "All it needs is a little more bad news and it's gone. I think it's going to take a miracle to pull this out of the net."

Cap & Bells presents Pirandello's Chee-Chee and The Imbecile

by Alexis Pollock

Last Friday and Saturday evenings, Cap and Bells transformed the living room of Perry House into an intimate arena where two one-act plays by Italian playwright Luigi Pirandello were staged. Both The Imbecile and Chee-Chee, written in the early 1920's, reflect the playwright's own dual existence and view of people as deceptive of others and themselves.

The sets were simple. The first, representing a study at a newspaper office, consisted of a couch at the north end of the room, and a desk and chair toward the south. Chee-Chee takes place in a hotel room for which a smaller sofa, two chairs, and a coffee table were used. The audience bordered the action on three sides but was much closer to it in the former, during which the actors ran about the room, using most of the available space, whereas the interaction in the latter was primarily centered around the furniture at the north end.

The Imbecile, directed by Baird Jarman '92, was admittedly the more abstract of the two plays. It is a fast-paced, fragmentary work. If one suspended the desire to figure out precisely what was happening, for the characters do not even seem to know themselves, it could be enjoyed for the acting and quick, fluid direction.

The story is centered around Leopoldo Paroni, an arrogant, power-hungry newspaper editor played by Chuck Pecor '92. During the initial screaming with which the play begins we learn that Paroni wishes we only hear, dead.

There is also an uproar over a much heard about but never seen riot, and this confusion is heightened by the news of the suicide of another off-stage character, Lulu Pulino. Paroni is outraged that Pulino did not make his self-destruction enjoyable by killing Mazarini before ending his own life. Ironically, his enemy possesses the same warped ideas and has sent suicidal Luca Fazio, played by David Dibble '91, to end Paroni's life before taking his own; the latter half of the play consists of this confrontation. It is sickly Luca whom the audience first sees; indeed, he was already huddled on the couch as the audience took its seats. Dibble played this maniacal character adeptly, increasing his energy as Luca became more angry and dominant. From Luca's initial histrionic coughing frenzy, to his swelling sense of confidence, Dibble was capturing, in his jerky, fumbling motions as he attempted to handle his gun and intimidate Paroni were hilarious. Equally impressive was the manner in which he gained control and seemed to passionately enjoy tormenting and humiliating Paroni. It is a part which calls for a complex performance, and Dibble was right on the mark.

While the rapid pace of the play complemented the crazed actions of Luca, it detracted a bit from the development of Paroni, causing some of his caustic lines to be lost. Nonetheless, Pecor played the egocentric editor with command. Although he could have had more vigor, his booming voice and grand gestures conveyed the angry side of Paroni's character smoothly. However, it was when backed against the wall with Luca's gun pointed at him that Pecor was most convincing at displaying his character's hypocritical cowardice. The tremor in his voice and look on his face seemed genuine, but a poorly timed "escape" at the window was not as authentic. It seemed exaggerated and silly instead of pathetic or ironic. The audience needed more time to understand Paroni; yet with the time he had, Pecor convincingly depicted his tyranny and cowardice.

Charley Rardin '91 played the wide-eyed salesman who enters, is understandably confused by the chaos around him, and consequently decides to ignore it since Luca is the only one who acknowledges him. Rardin's look of shock and disbelief upon Luca's violent reaction to him was amusing, and something which connected him to the audience.

Also amusing were Caitlin Osborne '91 and Allison Achauer '93 as two of Paroni's reporters, Coni and Fabrizio. Energetically darting in, out, and around the room they were almost caricatures, pawns of their editor, who really did have a handle on the situation. Achauer's breathless recounting of events and Osborne's animated excitement at hearing them were brief but enjoyable.

Christy Leach '92 was also effective as Rosa Leveschia, a morbid woman with publicity on her mind who enters to vividly describe the scene of Pulino's suicide. Again, the rapid pace of the show prevented us from seeing much of her. In fact, the play has more characters than may seem to fit in a short one-act, but I believe Pirandello uses them to further the confusion they experience as characters and we feel as a sense of gloom; consequently, the audience was unsure Friday night if it was indeed over when Luca and Paroni ended together. Jarman beamed as he waited for the audience to respond; hopefully, he was not smiling at the misreading and standing but also at the fine job he and his cast did in executing a difficult show. When the audience finally did respond, they seemed genuinely impressed and entertained.

A more straightforward story line Chee-Chee, directed by Toby Miller '92, with its smaller cast and more straightforward story line was easier to understand.

The title role was seized by Cameron Baird '93. He played the playboy swindler with impressive bravado, showing Chee-Chee's love of pleasure and money while also showing his tenuous grasp on them. His timing was precise as he wavered between Chee-Chee's absent-mindedness and ability to contrive a plan quickly and diffuse the responsibility of carrying it out to someone else. Baird conveyed his craft smoothly and expertly, playing the dominant chum in need of a favor to Commendatore Squatriglia, played by Chris Green '92, and changing his tone to smooth talk Nada, played by Ramona Liberoff '91.

Chris Green's Commendatore played magnificently against Chee-Chee and Nada. From the moment he lurched into the room, one eye patched, the other peering around in search of Chee-Chee, the audience was his. He was hilarious throughout, from his squeamish fear of carrying out Chee-Chee's plan to get the useless bank notes back from Nada to his over-zealous execution of it, denouncing Chee-Chee any way possible. Green did not miss any opportunity to delight the audience. His lines burst from him—he was the Commendatore—growing more bold with his own performance until finally bowing to Nada's own coniving. His portrayal was the best of the evening and the most amusing I have seen on this campus.

The strength of Liberoff's performance of Nada surfaced with her more serious lines. Liberoff's anger and disbelief upon hearing the Commendatore's denunciation of Chee-Chee were sharp and honest. Her mocking of Green's character as he spewed insults upon Chee-Chee was a bit overdone, if not unnecessary, yet this was the only real flaw in her performance and may have been a due to direction, interpretation, or both. Nonetheless, she displayed Nada's own corruption well, and at the end of the play her character and Baird's played off one another nicely, showing the despicable yet charming deviousness of both.

Meliter and his cast did a fine job as evidenced by the uproarious laughter and smiles which came from the audience during the performance. It was a thoroughly entertaining production which succeeded in being humorous on many levels from slapstick to black comedy.

ness. Showing no mercy from the start, the team of Chris Colburn '93, Ben Garcia '92, Greg Jordan '92 and Ivan Sigal '91 won the medley relay, followed by Rob Benson '90, Dave Caplan '92, Paul Dehmel '91, and Trevor Pound '93.

After this display of Eph superiority, things got worse for the unlucky visitors. Barry King '93 won the 1000 free, the 200 fly and the 400 IM, thus completing the stainless steel cross of three tough events.

The Ephs' 400 backup squad of Dehmel, Al Webster '92 and Mike Lane '90 sent Hamilton a message by sweeping the IM with King. Dehmel also won the 500 followed by Dan Snyder '90, who played with his opponent as a cat toys with a mouse before dispatching of him. Garcia, Kaplan and Rob Jeng '92 swept the 200 breast.

The divers shone as always, with the high-flying acrobatic team of Scott Schwager '91 and Drew Ades '92 swept the 3 meter board and, joined by Brian Cameron '90, one-two-three the help-less Hamilton divers.

Sprint freestyle was another spot of Eph glory when Sigal won the 50 and Andrew Kirkpatrick '93 touched out several men for a victory in the 100 free. After the formality of the final relay, in which Kirkpatrick, Pound, Eric Swanson '92 and Colburn humbled the visitors yet again, the final score read Ephs 186, bad guys 56. The Ephs did not lose one race in this ugly bloodbath.

The Ephmen will hit the road on Saturday as they travel to Maine for a meet with Bowdoin.

Racquetees crush Smith 9-0, head to Vassar

by Allison Meade

In the Smith Invitational on Saturday, the women's varsity squash squad was finally able to celebrate a victory after three straight losses. Williams smashed Smith 9-0, and six of the nine players scored shutouts over their opponents.

Women's squash

But the day was not without its miseries. The Williams team began the tournament by being whipped 9-0 at the hands of a powerful University of Pennsylvania squad. The Penn team gave up only two games in the entire match, both to eighth seed Christine Ohly '90, who played a fierce match but finally fell to Penn's Nancy Bell 5-15, 12-15, 10-15, 15-7, 7-15. In spite of the humiliating loss to Penn, the Ephwomen were able to pull themselves back together for the match against Smith.

"It was hard to re-focus after the loss to Penn, but they were able to do it," said head coach Gail Ramsay. In reviewing several solid matches against Smith, Ramsay highlighted those of fourth seed Timmie Friend '90 and first seed Lisa Brayton '91.

Friend dropped the first two games of her match before returning to dominate the rest of the match, though at one point the fifth and deciding game was tied up at nine pieces before Friend pulled away and pocketed a 15-10 victory, thereby sealing a 10-15, 12-15, 15-4, 15-5, 15-10 win.

Brayton completely dominated in a 15-4, 15-2, 15-3 win which Ramsay described as "a very sharp match for Lisa. She was very accurate in her shot selection and controlled the 'T' [the area of the court where players position themselves to be most successful efficiently]." In other matches, third-seeded Jennifer Thurman '93 pulled out a 3-2 win, and senior Christine Ohly won 3-1 in the eighth position. Susie Piper '90, Miriam Marcus '91, Amanda Crane '91 and Holly Hedeman '91 all rolled to strong 3-0 victories.

Earlier in the week, the Williams squad fell to Dartmouth 0-9, in a match they would rather like to forget. Only three players, Abigail Ash '91, Hedeman, and Brayton, were able to extend their opponents beyond three games, each eventually falling 1-3.

The team now stands at 2-4 and plays at Vassar tomorrow evening. This weekend, they will host the Williams Invitational.

proved to 8-5 on the season and was led by forward Aaron Bedard with 18 points.

Conte shone for the Ephs in defeat, netting 20 second-half points on his way to a 23-point evening. He shot 5 of 11 from three point range and 7 of 14 from the field for the game.

The sophomore guard started the season slowly, but he seems to have finally regained the shooting touch that earned him such acclaim as a freshman last season.

"We've encouraged him to keep shooting," Coach Sheehy said, "because a good shooter will eventually do the job, and he's doing it for us now."

The Williams squad will hit the hardwood at Chandler tonight in a matchup with the Middlebury Panthers. Over the coming weekend the Ephmen will journey to Maine for tough matchups with both Colby and Bates.

Conte on fire

The Ephmen were unable to get back into the groove offensively, as the Engineers pulled to a 58-52 lead with two minutes left in the game. Conte excited the crowd with a trio of three-point bombs in the final minutes, the last one drawing the Ephs to within 65-61 with 24 seconds remaining.

But Williams could get no closer, as the Engineers were perfect from the charity stripe to put the game away. R.P.I. im-open Borden, however, stemmed the Smith rally, and was the beginning of what appeared to be a roll for Williams, which scored on back-to-back possessions and brought the score to 62-53 with 8:30 left in the game. From this point on, the second half mirrored the first, as Smith's aggressive offense struggled to regain the lead.

A sudden drought

With 4:30 left in the game, Williams still led by four, 67-63. For the next three and a half minutes of the game both sides struggled to pull ahead, but turnovers and poor shooting led to a drought and neither team scored until, with under one minute left in the game, Smith knocked in a baseline three-point shot.

The Ephs gained possession, but Smith repeatedly fouled, forcing the Ephwomen to set up plays again and again as they inbounded the ball. Finally Martha Lucy '92 stepped up to the line for a foul shot but missed, and Smith gained possession with 11 seconds left. As Smith's Gervasio went up for the shot which might well have won the game for her squad, Lucy blocked the shot and drew the charge, stopping Smith in its tracks with three seconds remaining. Williams won the game with a final score of 67-66. Borden had 19 points at the end of the game, Mularczyk 14, and Brown and Broadhurst pitched in with nine and six, respectively.

The strong offensive performance that the Ephs turned in against Smith proved that they could work together as an offensive force, and dominate the game. However, the squad headed into Saturday's showdown at Amherst with a dismal road record despite mild success at home.

Singing the road blues

And Saturday was no different, as the Ephwomen dropped an 81-63 decision. At the end of the first half, the game was tied 32-32. But in the second half the Williams offense broke down. The team's offense played an undisciplined brand of ball which resulted in poor shots and rushed plays, according to coach Nancy Roberts.

Borden again blazed her own offensive trail with nine rebounds and 12 points. Brown followed closely with 12 rebounds and eight points, and Broadhurst turned in an amazing performance with 4 rebounds, 5 assists, and 16 points. Lucy also pitched in with 7 assists.

Despite a great deal of hard work, the team needs to learn to work patiently on offense. However, on Saturday a strong Amherst showing only compounded Williams' offensive problems, as the Lord Jeffs capitalized on every mistake the Ephs made. Had the Ephs had the opportunity to recover some of their errors, the game might have had a different conclusion. The defensive performance of the Ephwomen was once again a strong one, with both good coverage and blocks.

"We're a young team and we have a lot of talent," noted Roberts, echoing the positive outlook that she and the team have shared from the start of the season. "We have the potential to be a really strong force in the league. The women on the team work really hard and we will continue to develop our offense, but the squad is very determined and always goes out to win. We deserved to win the game against Amherst. Next time we will."

Next time will be tomorrow night, as the squad travels to Vassar for a 7:00 contest.

Junior Marc Klaus stormed to a victory in the IM Ski Race, held at Brodie on January 19th. In so doing, he also led a contingent of six racers from Elm to a team triumph, edging out a team formed by the FRS houses. Klaus won with a time of 39:29 seconds, just beating freshman Ben Whaley (39:70) and junior John Cort (40:54). In all, the race involved thirty-four racers representing twelve houses.

Men's j.v. hoops downed in overtime thriller

by Paul Grossman

Last Tuesday, the j.v. hoopers began to show the depth of their talent as they faced a determined R.P.I. squad visiting from Troy. In a game full of outstanding individual performances, the Williams team fell just short, falling 75-70 in overtime.

John Engel '93 had a terrific night against the Engineers despite some questionable fouls called against him. Not only did he grab nine rebounds to go along with his seven points, but he played the game from start to finish with a grim intensity that seemed to inspire the rest of the squad.

Adam Brandt '93 had yet another good scoring night, shooting just under 45 percent from the field and pouring in 19 points, including a pair of three-pointers and a bunch of drives leading to acrobatic shots from the paint.

Tim Snider '92 played well in his starting position at the point, while Wayne Franklin '93 exploded for 10 points and nine rebounds, over half of which came off the offensive glass. The contest also pulled up and unleashed three-pointers, instead of entering into a half court offense. This strategy was new to the inexperienced Williams squad, and they had difficulty adapting to it. The game was exciting to watch, and should be viewed not as a disappointing loss, but rather as a display of the potential on this young Williams team.

Loss to Amherst

The team concluded the week with a loss to archrival Amherst on Saturday, by a score of 80-69. The Williams performance was very flat in comparison to the effort against R.P.I. There were no major deficiencies in the Ephs' attack, but the offense never really got on track.

Williams was downed by only four at the half, but a string of turnovers in the second half resulted in easy Amherst baskets, pushing the game out of reach. There were several bright spots for the Ephmen. Brandt and Duquette both had good scoring performances, and the latter again showed clutch shooting ability, popping two three-pointers in the final minutes of the game. Also, Wells Messersmith '92 established himself as a rebounding force off the bench.

The Williams j.v. squad will be tested at 6:00 tonight in a home game against Union. This matchup promises a good deal of excitement and presents a great way for fans to get psyched for the varsity game following at 8:00.

Plagued by illness, the Williams wrestling team placed fourth at the MIT Invitational this past weekend. The two top teams fighting for first place were Springfield and Rhode Island.

Freshmen Bill Sullivan, wrestling in the 118 lb. class, dominated his weight class and was the first champ at the MIT tour-

When asked if there were any surprises, Caron said, "Sullivan winning the tourney as a freshman is a surprise. But we knew of his ability."

Overall, Caron said he was pleased with the performance, but frustrated that the team was unhealthy. "We want to have ten wins this year and a Little Three title, but we can't do it if kids are sick."

The grapplers climb onto the team bus again this week for a Wednesday match against nationally-ranked Oregon State, and then head to Trinity on Saturday for a tri-meet.

Squash team delights in win over non-Ivy MIT

by Rhonda Goodman

After dealing with powerhouse teams from Princeton, Harvard and Yale, the men's squash team finally enjoyed a victorious day of its own. The racquet-ers defeated MIT 9-1 to notch their first win of the season. The Ephs, who also dropped matches to Ivy League opponents Yale and Dartmouth last week, now stand at 1-4.

The squad had no trouble handling MIT. Bruce Hopper '92, the team's top seed, quickly overcame his frustration at dropping the first game of his match and overpowered his opponent 9-15, 15-8, 15-4, 15-9.

Second seed Andy Clayton '93 gradually pulled away from his opponent. He broke a 13-13 tie to win the first game 18-14. Clayton took complete control from there to ice the win with 15-8 and 15-5 wins. Third seed Chris Pentz '91 did not fare as well as his teammates, however, as he fell to his hard-hitting adversary 12-15, 11-15, 8-15.

The most exciting match of the day featured fourth seed and captain John Birgauer '90. Although he won the first game easily 15-9, he had to dig his way out of a 6-12 hole to tie the second game at 13-13. But he couldn't pull the game out, and fell 14-15. Birgauer took the third game 15-11, but lost narrowly in the fourth, 15-12. He won the fifth game and the match, wearing down his opponent 15-5.

Fifth seed Rob Illig '91 had to last through two tie-breakers to win his opening game 17-16. He came out on top after a close second game 15-12, and finally overwhelmed his opponent in the third game, winning the match at 15-3.

A broken record?

Earlier in the day, James McLain '93, playing on the same court as Illig, also had to pull out the first game after two tie-breakers; he too won 17-16. McLain cruised through the next two games, however, to win the match.

Steve Busbey '90, the seventh seed, also had little trouble defeating his opponent. Eighth, ninth and tenth seeds Don MacKinnon '90, Zia Mahmood '90 and Henry Woo '91 barely broke sweats as they dominated their MIT adversaries.

Coach Dave Johnson said the team's confidence required a boost after the early season schedule, which saw them play some of the best teams in the country. But he doesn't mind that the match against MIT was almost too easy.

"We needed a match like this after the stretch we've been through," he said. "Now the teams we will be playing are more on our level."

On Friday, the Ephs were matched against Yale. Overmatched is probably a better word, though, as the Bulldogs overpowered the Ephs from the start in winning every game in a 9-0 rout.

On Tuesday, the Ephs hit the road for the first time this season and lost to Dartmouth, 8-1. MacKinnon and Mahmood did take their opponents to five games, however, before their tanks ran out of gas. The one shining star for the Ephs was Clayton, who turned in a 15-9, 15-5, 15-10 win.

The Ephs will try to maintain any momentum they picked up in the MIT match when they play Tufts on Saturday.

Women down Engineers, but then lose 1-0

by Kathie Lapey

On Saturday the women's hockey club traveled to Boston to face MIT. Due to the absence of a legitimate referee, Briggs' troops were forced to deal with a substitute who neglected to make many crucial calls. Yet they held their own and played a close, tough game before dropping a frustrating 1-0 decision.

During the first period, Williams started slowly and MIT scored the lone goal of the game on a power play. However, the Ephwomen picked up speed and the next two periods were evenly matched. Goalie Sue Pitcher '90 put in yet another stellar performance with 31 saves.

Tri-captain Kristin Moomaw '90 displayed defensive tactics that saved Williams again and again. The "white" line of Holly Christoferson '92, Val Grandison '92 and Alex Page '92 continually demanded the puck and worked especially well together. However, despite many near goals, Williams was unable to put the biscuit into the MIT net.

Earlier in the week, the team crushed RPI 4-1 in an exciting game. After a slow, scoreless first period, Williams began to flourish in the second period with a scrappy rebound goal by Kathie Lapey '90 assisted by Timmy Sage '92. By the third period, Briggs' troops were on fire offensively and tri-captain Kara Lynne '90, assisted by tri-captain Jill Magnuson '90, put in a quick one to widen the gap to 2-0.

Later in the period, RPI managed to score, but their rally was quickly thwarted by sophomore Lenke Wood's brilliant breakaway and unassisted goal. Finally, Lapey was awarded a penalty shot that Hilary Klotz '90 described as a "hum-dinger" topcoring into the upper right corner.

Men's j.v. squash on roller coaster

by John Bugbee

The men's junior varsity squash team continued its roller-coaster tale of wins and losses last week, splitting two matches with Dartmouth and Yale. The Ephs accompanied the varsity racquet-ers to Dartmouth last Tuesday to come up with a solid 6-3 victory. Last Friday they again stood beside their varsity counterparts as Yale rolled over both squads in Lasell.

Yale's warriors took no prisoners Friday afternoon, according to Williams coach Dave Johnson, and the Ephs' scores reflected their attitudes. Jay Emerson '92, playing fifth for Williams, was the only Eph to wrest a single game from his opponent in the course of Yale's 7-0 j.v. triumph.

There was no question of lackluster play on the part of the Ephmen. They were simply overwhelmed by superior players. Johnson, calling Yale's varsity line-up the best in the country, said that most of his players "were playing as well as they could. They were simply outclassed."

Sixth seed Tom Warren '92 concurred; when asked whether Williams played as well as it might have, he said, "There was no way to tell. [Yale] was just too good."

Eric Schwab '92, who played third for the j.v. and thirteenth overall, thought his opponent so good that Eph varsity first- and second-seeds Bruce Hopper '92 or Andy Clayton '93 would have had tough matches with him.

"The difference between Yale and us is that we do five minutes of three wall drills; they do five minutes of double-boast drills," said one j.v. Ephman. A double boast is an extremely difficult shot in which the ball hits both side walls before reaching the front, and of which j.v. player Hugh Howards '92 had said days earlier, "I don't see how anyone hits a double boast on purpose."

On a happier note, the Ephs' defeat of Dartmouth three days earlier was a pleasant surprise, according to Johnson, even though Dartmouth is "a notch below Harvard, Princeton, and Yale." He was surprised by the Dartmouth squad's lack of depth, pointing out that the Ephs won the top four j.v. matches.

This week's win-and-loss cycle (the Ephs have yet to either win or lose two matches in a row) leaves the junior varsity with a 4-4 record. Sadly, the team may not get much of a chance to improve that record. The matches remaining on the calendar are few and dwindling fast.

Amherst has recently scrapped its j.v. squash program, so there will be no match there. Only two February matches against Trinity and Wesleyan remain for the j.v. Ephs. In fact, the Trinity match may not come to pass, as Trinity also seems to be having doubts about its j.v. team. The Ephs thus face the prospect of six weeks of in-season play with only a single match. Johnson hopes to keep his players keen by drawing in prep schools to do battle. He is also considering the possibility of a j.v.-faculty match.

Skiers encounter mild success at Bates carnival, eagerly eye St. Lawrence meet

by Kerr Houston

Last weekend the men's and women's ski teams got out their wax and strapped on their boots for their first race of the year, as they headed to Maine for the Bates College Winter Carnival. Under cloudy skies that dumped snow on most of New England a day after the carnival, the women skied their way to an impressive third place finish, while the men found themselves in fifth after the times had been totaled.

The women's high finish was spearheaded by sophomore Ariana Grosse, who posted a team-best eighth-place finish in the giant slalom and a tenth-place showing in the slalom. Junior Amy Sullivan led the Ephwomen in the slalom, and saw her performance echoed by a solid weekend from the Nordic corps. Kris Hansen '91, who finished fourth in the Nordic race, and freshman Nicole Kimball, with a sixth-place showing in the cross-country event, led the Nordic squad. By the weekend's end the women skiers had collected 294 points to edge past Dartmouth (293) into third place, trailing only Green Mountain State powerhouse University of Vermont (357) and Middlebury (330).

"The women should be congratulated for a very strong showing," Williams coach Ed Grees said. "They proved that they're a very strong team."

Men slightly disappointed

The men's squad attacked Mount Abrams with similar vigor although with slightly less success, as a disappointing Alpine showing led to a fifth-place team finish. Junior Landon Seod happily displayed the form that has made him one of the top downhillers in Massachusetts, rocketing his way to a fourth-place finish in the men's giant slalom. Teammate Bill Crowley '91 noticed a seventh-place finish to supplement Seod's finish.

In the slalom, senior J.P. Parisien wound up in fourth, with teammate Eric Grosse '91 right behind him in fifth. Despite these encouraging finishes, however, Grosse noted that it was not the men's turn to shine, as the team "had a very poor showing. There were not very many finishers."

The Nordic men were led by some outstanding skiing by sophomore John Coequet, who placed 15th in the Nordic race and 17th in the cross-country event. In the end, however, the men found themselves in fifth overall with 219 points, trailing Vermont (365), Middlebury (328), Dartmouth (301), and New Hampshire (250).

Both teams will take their skins in hand this weekend and will travel to the St. Lawrence Winter Carnival for their second event of the year.

Athlete of the Week

This week's Athlete of the Week is freshman swimmer Liz Hickey, who stroked her way to a new school record in the 200 meter butterfly on Saturday. Her 2:13.61 time erased sophomore Elizabeth Elberhart's old mark and, coupled with a win in the 100 fly, gave Hickey her second victory of the day.

Cagers down Smith by 1, fall to Amherst

by Asli Bali

The women's varsity basketball team continued to trod the path toward improvement last week. After dominating a strong Smith team at home last Thursday, they were unable to maintain their momentum in an away game at Amherst this Saturday. The squad's record now stands at 3-6.

The Ephs started off their week with an away game at Union that saw Audrey Mautner '92 face off against her twin sister. The team continued to encounter the difficulties that have plagued them thus far on the road. From the start, they struggled with their offense and by the end of the first half they were trailing 27-16.

Women's hoops

A strong Williams defense kept the Union offense at bay, and led to a low-scoring game. However, the Williams offensive could never get going, and the Ephs suffered from familiar problems: poor shots and a rushed offense that resulted in turnovers.

The team worked hard throughout to stay on Union, but was shut down offensively and never recovered. As usual, Becca Borden '91 led the Ephs in scoring with 12 points. The final score saw the Ephs win on the slim end of a 51-37 score.

A close one at home

In their next game, at home against a strong Smith squad, the Ephs turned in a great offensive performance. The first ten minutes of the game were all Williams, as the Ephs pulled away to lead by as many as 10 points. Smith suffered from poor ball handling, and was consistently denied any baseline shots. Forced to pass the ball around the perimeter and with no strong outside shooters, the Smith squad was unable to gain any ground offensively.

Williams was having some difficulty with passing, but the Smith defense was unable to capitalize on mistakes made by the Ephs, and, behind the offensive firepower of Borden and Meg Brown '91, Williams dominated.

Williams also managed to draw the foul in several instances, and a perfect record from the charity stripe gave the Ephs an additional offensive edge.

With 8:30 left in the half, the Ephs were ahead 22-12. However, in the last five minutes of the half, Smith managed to cut down the lead and even momentarily overtake the Williams squad. With four minutes in the game Williams was nurturing a 26-24 lead that was slipping quickly due to missed scoring opportunities and bad passes.

The score was 28-28 when Smith turned in a three-point play, earning a three-point lead with under three minutes remaining in the half. Kerry Mulaczuk '93 showed some real offensive power with two shots in a row and gave the Ephs the edge. After a Smith basket, buckets by Borden and Megan King '90 put the Ephs on top once more. Moments later, the buzzer sounded and the Ephs headed to the locker room up 36-33.

For Williams in the first half, the offensive direction on the court came from

Kris Broadhurst '92, who set up the plays and snagged two rebounds, and the offensive power came from Borden who had 13 points at the half.

In the first minute of the second half the Ephs increased their lead to 40-33 with a shot from Brown and two foul shots from Broadhurst. However, Smith soon began to gain ground by penetrating the Williams defense under the basket and ripping down offensive rebounds while pressing on defense. The Ephs began to rush on offense and committed several turnovers while seeing their lead quickly evaporate to a mere three points.

Balanced track team flexes muscles

by Josh Brumberg

This past Saturday the men and women of the Williams track team ventured out of the Purple Valley to the campus of Hamilton College in Clinton, New York for a tri-meet between Williams, Union and Hamilton.

In tri-meets the individual results of the runners are assigned point values and added together to form a cumulative score for each team. In this sort of competition an all-around performance is necessary for team success, and that is exactly what the fleet footed Williams runners turned in.

Hamilton's track is a hard and smooth rubber track, unlike the track here at Williams. As a result, the Eph runners could not use their racing spikes. The team had little difficulty in adjusting to the different conditions, however.

"It was not as much of a problem as I anticipated it would be," Bradford Behr '92 said. Most of the runners had racing flats and those that didn't were able to borrow a pair. Behr said that the lack of spikes didn't lead to slower times because the track was fast.

The men's team turned in a strong performance, led by Behr's personal best of 1:07.7 in the 500m. Freshman sensation Jeffrey Cooper knocked a second off his time from the previous week to garner a win in the 800m. Despite questionable timing by the officials, senior captain Dale Johnson won the 1000m in 2:39. Larry Smith '92 pulled off an impressive double by winning both the 200m and the 400m.

Four different Ephs qualified for the finals of the 55m, and John Lindley '92 came away with the victory. Steve Moran '91 won the pole vault competition, while Phillip Justus '93 came within 10 inches of taking fourth place in the shot put after throwing for the first time ever on Friday. The well-balanced Williams squad was simply too much for Union and Hamilton to handle, and the Ephs returned home victorious.

Women outclass competition

The women ran well once again, demonstrating why they are one of the top teams in the region. Senior co-captains Alison Smith and Susan Gray led the Ephs to victory by winning the 400m and the 500m respectively. The 500m event, which is an unusual racing distance, saw two other Williams runners place in the top four, as Karen Morrissey '93 finished second and Katie Quincey '92 took fourth. Sophomore Cherie Macauley led a strong Williams showing in the 800m with a 2:23, good for a first place finish.

Anne Platt '91 won the 1500m, while Kira Shields '91 won the 200m. Sophomore distance runner Hilary Cairns lapped most of the field on her way to a 75-second victory in the 3000m.

The Williams relay teams won both the 1600m and the 3200m, with Smith running a strong anchor leg in the former race to clinch a victory over Union by .9 seconds. As a result of these excellent performances, the Williams women returned to the Purple Valley with the same result as the men.

Next week the men will travel to a rare Friday meet at M.I.T., while the women will be heading to Northampton to compete at Smith. On Sunday many Williams runners will attend a TAC meet being held at Harvard.

are made of with a victory in the 500 free. Other victories were recorded by Nye in a surprise 100 breast appearance, Eberhart in the 100 back and Lebeau in the 200 free.

The women of the meet was Liz Hickey '93. While her victory in the 100 fly was impressive, it could not compare to her performance in the 200. Her mark of 2:13.61 set a new school record, breaking the old mark of 2:13.63 set by teammate Eberhart.

Men hold up half the sky

After last week's humbling, the men were looking to hurt something small, and it was unfortunate for Hamilton that they happened in. Prior to the meet, the Ephs were worried since their roster and the infirmity's flu roll-call were practically identical, but they soon overcame any adversity stemming from sick-

Swimming teams dominate Hamilton in lopsided meet

Women also down Smith; Hickey sets school record in 213-81 victory

by Mike Lane

The Williams men's and women's swim teams enjoyed their time in the pool last week, as the women dominated Smith 205.5 to 93.5 and both teams thoroughly drowned Hamilton at home.

The women went to Smith on Wednesday eager to bounce back from last week's defeat. The women clearly dominated almost every race. The medley relay of Dore Lebeau '91, Ulla Pitha '93, Jana Swail '93 and Abbe Marrs '93 crushed all opposition.

Pitha continued her breaststroke domination with victories in the 100 and 200 and posted an impressive victory with a first-time swim in the 400 IM. Swail and Leslie Nye '93 showed frosh unity with victories in the 100 fly and 200 freestyle. Vanessa Gibbons '93 and Mitch Froemer '90 took first and second in the 1000 free, swimming so well that one Smith swimmer declined to finish the race. They also took second and first in the 500 freestyle. Other victors were Lee Schroeder '91 in the 50 free and Lebeau in the 100 and 200 backs. The lady divers kicked the Smith dogs when they were down. Ashley Clarey '91, Ashley Deeks '93 and Carola Poggenburg '90 swept the 3 meter board, and Clarey and Deeks went one-two on the 1 meter board.

Hamilton crushed

On Saturday both teams faced Hamilton. Present in the crowd was ex-Eph coach and Swimming Hall of Fame inductee Bob Muir. With both teams heeding coach Samuelson's words of caution that "Hamiltonians are devious," the Ephs entered the pool hungry for a victory.

In the tradition of Dorothy and the Wicked Witch, the women "housed" their opponents 213 to 81. Lebeau, Nye, Liz Eberhart '92 and Schroeder continued the women's "first blood" tradition by once again winning the medley relay. Schroeder had a great day, with victories in the 50 and 100 freestyles.

Basketball downs Lord Jeffs, stands at 9-2

by Jeff Merritt

To the delight of Williams faithfuls who made the trek down to Amherst's LeFrak Gymnasium for Saturday night's men's basketball showdown, the Ephs came away with a thrilling 75-69 victory. The packed house at LeFrak saw a 22-point Williams lead dissipate into a slim two-point margin in the final minute, but the Eph cagers held on at the end to lift their season mark to 9-2.

The Defectors were unable to give their fans much to cheer about in the first half. Williams jumped out to an early 11-4 lead, on the strength of eight points from big man Than Healy '91. The Ephs played margin, nine different players lit up the visitors' side of the scoreboard. Captain Garcia Major '90 led the way with 11 points, including a few incredible drives to the hoop, and Healy added 10 points of his own.

Where'd the lead go?

Williams built a 58-36 bulge in the early minutes of the second half, but the Amherst crowd continued to make as much noise as possible in the hope of a Lord Jeff comeback. The Williams fans responded to these cheers by pointing at the scoreboard, but they soon were glancing at the score with anxiety instead of pride, as the lead began to vanish.

Amherst cut the margin to 10 for the first time with 6:20 remaining in the game, but the Ephs still held a fairly comfortable 69-61 lead with under three minutes to play.

Then came a rather familiar sight for Williams basketball fans. The Ephs began to miss free throws.

With Williams attempting to run time off the clock in the final minutes, the Defectors fouled at every opportunity, sending the Ephs to the charity stripe. Converted free throws would have led the contest, but the Ephs missed the front end of one-and-one's repeatedly, enabling the Jeffs to cut into the Williams lead even further.

Cutting it close

An Amherst drive to the hoop with 1:01 left drew them to within 71-67, and then guard John Conie '92 was quickly fouled. The normally accurate Conie missed from the line, and the Jeffs came back down the floor and tossed up a three-pointer. The shot was off the mark, but Amherst co-captain Hank Lynch grabbed the rebound and was fouled by Sherman Jones '92 with 31 ticks left on the clock. Lynch sank both of his free throws, making the score 71-69.

The Ephs broke the Amherst press and took 12 seconds off the clock before Conie was again sent to the line. This time the sophomore guard was perfect, pushing the Williams lead back to four points. The Jeffs rushed the ball back up the floor, but an errant pass resulted in a loose ball that eventually wound up in Eph hands. Rich Williams '90 was fouled in the final seconds, and he also sank a pair of free throws to leave the score at 75-69 at the buzzer.

Captain Harry Sheehy turned to the noisy Williams fans behind the Eph bench and raised his arms in appreciation of their support, and the fans continued to applaud the hard fought victory. Four different Ephs scored in double figures, with Healy leading the team with 17 points and Major registering 15. Jones added 14 points and Williams chimed in with 11 of his own.

"We were disappointed to only beat them by six," Healy said. "We came in expecting to win by more, but beating them at Amherst feels great."

Power plant stirs controversy

A proposed 125-megawatt cogeneration power plant to be built near Williamstown's land-fill has created debate among local residents. Under the proposal submitted by the Meridian Power Corporation, a large power plant burning natural gas would create electricity to be sold to utilities companies. The waste steam would be used for heating, with Williams College as a possible buyer.

At the beginning of 1989, Meridian officials approached the college to site the plant directly on the campus, preferably at the location of the college's present power plant.

"They were looking into building here. At one point, they approached the college about building on campus," Director of Public Information James Kolesar said.

The college declined the offer, however. "There's not that much space [on campus] that the college would be willing to give up," Kolesar said.

After negotiations with town selectmen, Meridian now hopes to purchase a plot of town land along the Hoosac River near Hopkins Forest. The company is also looking into alternative sites in North Adams.

An ad-hoc group of concerned citizens has formed to stop the proposal before it gets underway. "Once they break ground, we're finished," Dave Loomis, one of the group's members, said. Loomis' house lies adjacent to the land which Meridian hopes to acquire.

Citizens with a variety of interests have expressed reservations about the proposal. Many fear the noise and the poor visual impact the plant would have on Williamstown. High-voltage power lines and a possible high-pressure gas pipeline have created fears about the proposed plant's safety. Also, the plant would consume one million gallons of groundwater per day.

Community impact

According to Meridian Vice President William G. Harper, the community impact will not be negative but rather positive. "Community impact... Well, that's always in the eye of the beholder. What is community impact to this area? Yes, we want to put up a plant. The height of the building is 70 feet. The height of the stack is two and one-half times whatever the height of the building is... that's the law. The DEP [the Massachusetts Department of Environmental Protection] requires that the stack be that tall. "But it also brings in a lot of taxes... We can bring in an increase in the infrastructure that's already here," Harper said in a Berkshire Business Roundtable talk Wednesday, January 31, 1990 which The Advocate transcribed.

"[The plant] is a big jet engine, it's a steam turbine and they do scream," Harper added. "But the law states under the DEP that within ten feet of the boundary line of the project the sound level can only be raised by ten decibels. Me yelling across this room would be maybe sixty or seventy decibels over or what the room sound level is now. Ten decibels is a private conversation between two people over the ambient noise level in the room."

Environmental concerns

Conservationists are fearful of the loss of land fronting on the Hoosac River. Sulfuric and nitrous emissions which contribute to acid rain have also raised concern among environmentalists. The

by Tom Dupree

Joan Martin, senior executive secretary in the Dean's Office, died last Tuesday night, January 30, at the Berkshire Medical Center in Pittsfield. She was 56.

Dean of the College Stephen Fix notified the Williams community in a letter distributed Wednesday. In the letter, Fix said that Martin arrived for work Tuesday morning and became ill during the day.

Martin had worked in the Dean's Office since 1981. She graduated from North Adams State College in 1978, and held several jobs in the area before arriving at Williams. In addition to her job in the Dean's Office, Martin served as a volunteer at the Central Berkshire Hospital.

According to Fix, Martin worked closely with Deans William Darrow and Andrew Hernandez, focusing on freshmen concerns.

"She was constantly in contact with JAs, house advisors and freshmen," Fix said. "Lots of freshmen would have dealt with her at some point this year."

Last September, Martin addressed the freshman class at the opening assembly in Chapel Hall.

"She spoke briefly, but it was terrific," Fix said. "The students responded very warmly. She had a tremendous number of friends on campus, a huge network. She was a positive, kind person. This came as a great shock."

Martin is survived by her husband and seven children. The funeral was held Saturday in Pittsfield.

Flu epidemic strikes down Williams students

by Navin Girishankar

The normal winter outbreak of the flu on the Williams campus and throughout the Northeast hit especially hard this year. The Thompson Health Center has seen an unusual increase in the number of students suffering from symptoms common to the flu.

In the past few weeks many students have been hit by the flu and its aggravating symptoms. "Everyone was sick. The whole track team was sick," Lee Kiochel '93 said. "I was coughing a lot. I thought I could cure it by sleeping a lot."

Director of the Thompson Health Center Dr. James Corkins could not offer any explanation for the size of this year's flu epidemic. "There is an unusually large number of students getting the flu epidemic," he said. "This is the time of year when it commonly happens. This year it's an epidemic in not only the college, but in this community and the Northeast."

The college's infirmary received a large influx of ailing students during the early parts of January. "For the past two and a half to three weeks the inpatient population has been running at capacity," Corkins said. "On rare occasion we have asked the less sick people to move on."

The symptoms of the flu are easily seen and Corkins emphasized the importance of treatment and caution. "The symptoms are fever, body aches, headache, nausea, and dry cough. I think the best people can do is use common sense - wash their hands, cover their mouths when coughing."

"I was fatigued. I had a stuffy head and I coughed," Stephen Lane '93 said. Like many others who experienced these symptoms, he did not go to the infirmary. "They're not going to do anything I'm not going to do myself."

Corkins encouraged students who have flu symptoms to go to the infirmary for treatment and not to try to cure themselves. "To be sure, when someone gets ill, we need to evaluate carefully and not look at it as just another student with the flu," he said. "If students are falling sick, we would like to have the chance to evaluate them."

However, Corkins said he was convinced that the flu epidemic was on a downward swing.

The Thompson Health Services Center was a familiar sight to many Williams students last month. The center was full of students fighting off the flu and other winter maladies. (Thomas)

Eastern European changes discussed

by Soojin Kim

Williams students and faculty discussed the recent upheavals in Eastern Europe with two involved sources last week: a former Czech labor camp prisoner and a foreign correspondent for the Washington Post. A panel discussion, titled "Crisis and Change in Eastern Europe: Roots and Prospects," addressed the issues of Eastern Europe's relationship with a disintegrating Soviet Union, economic reform and the prospect of German unification.

The panel included University of West Virginia Professor of History Michael Jakobson, Winter Study instructor and former Czechoslovakian government labor camp prisoner Jan Weiner and Washington Post reporter John Anderson '50. They were joined by Assistant Professor of History William Wagner and Assistant Professor of Economics Robert Whitesell.

According to Anderson, the Soviet Union's waning power is helping to drive reform in Eastern Europe. He attributed the capitulation to democratic reform by Communist leaders in Eastern Europe to hollowed-out governments which feared their own peoples.

"When the governments of Eastern Europe discovered Russian support gone, the leaders decided they could neither sufficiently trust nor control the military to use them against the demonstrators for political reform," he said.

The panelists cited the decline of Moscow's military and ideological power as partly responsible for Czechoslovakia's and Hungary's demands for the removal of Soviet troops. The panelists also saw the Soviet Union's struggle to preserve Soviet unity in the face of emerging nationalist movements in the Baltic republics and Soviet Central Asia as evidence of the shrinking of the Kremlin's sphere of influence.

"To understand the events in Hungary, where, as early as last spring, Hungarians were talking about abandoning the leading role of the Communist Party, you have to look back at the Revolution of 1956," Anderson said. "The reformers weren't converts to Jeffersonian democracy. They were haunted by 1956 when people sought to lynch government officials."

"Following World War II, Eastern European governments were fashioned by hardened men from Nazi jails, but that generation of committed Communists was unable to replicate itself," he continued. "In 1989 few officials were willing to risk their necks for the Communist Party."

"Eastern Europe deliberately avoided the use of force in order to survive," agreed Weiner, who is the author of several books on Czech history.

Weiner saw Poland's political reform in 1989 as a response to earlier Communist Party policies. "[It was] a grassroots movement led by students and intellectuals, as opposed to the 1968 attempt by the Communist Party to create socialism with a human face."

Although the consensus among the panelists seemed to be that the Soviet Union cannot go back in time with regard to Eastern Europe, political and economic ties remain. Some panelists feared that the nationalist subversions within the Soviet Union will have ramifications for Eastern Europe in that they might cause the Soviets to turn to another Stalin to stop the disintegration.

Wagner, however, did not foresee much danger of the Soviet Union's collapse.

Unity through diversity

According to Wagner, while the country's diversity is causing political turmoil, it may paradoxically be keeping the Soviet Union together.

Pointing out the trilateral relationships between ethnic groups and between each group and the Russians, Wagner said, "East and West Ukrainians, for example, are so different they are unlikely to achieve a consensus to separate."

Economic ties also make disentanglement from the Soviet Union difficult. For example, the nations of Eastern Europe are highly dependent on the Soviet Union for energy sources, according to Wagner.

One of the most important issues in the discussion was economic reform. Its significance was based on the premise that the staying power of a political system is ultimately determined by the people's happiness, which in turn partially depends on economic prosperity. Whitesell did not forecast a quick economic turn-around for Poland, which is currently struggling with massive inflation and foreign debt.

"The problem I see is that the Poles lack entrepreneurial experience and capital as well as sufficient Western aid," he said. "Three or four years of depression is likely and Polish workers won't stand for it."

Poor economic outlook

Whitesell said that he saw Romania as so economically depressed that further damage by reform is impossible, and that none of the other countries in the region had better outlooks. "Economic problems can't be solved before social and political reforms are carried out [in Bulgaria and Yugoslavia]," he said.

His prognosis for economic restructuring in the Soviet Union was also bleak. He said that the progress of economic reform in the Soviet Union is so slow as to be nonexistent.

Jacobson said that the Soviets are experiencing the problems of how to motivate workers and how to pay off foreign debts as they face the most fundamental changes in the institutional structure since the 1920s.

"In the 1920s the Soviet Union had a peasant-based economy," Wagner said. "Back then, the political objective of the leaders was to create an industrial society. But now that that objective has been reached, the conditions under which that system worked no longer pertain. The huge pool of unskilled labor is gone. Likewise the unsophisticated consumers

Cogeneration plant not needed

The Meridian Power Corporation of Boston has proposed the construction of a natural gas cogeneration power plant on a site along the Hoosac River. The 125-megawatt plant would provide electricity to local utilities and would use waste steam to provide heat, possibly for Williams College. As tempting as this enormous project seems for an area that has been in industrial decline, Williamstown does not really need this plant. The big dream behind the project is that providing huge amounts of energy will revitalize Williamstown's industrial base. However, that may be trying to recapture an era long gone by. With the closing of the Photocell photographic paper plant on Cole Avenue, the Williamstown business community now consists almost exclusively of Williams College and a few small shops. None of these need a new cogeneration plant -- indeed, the college already uses a 500-kilowatt cogeneration system which perfectly fulfills its needs.

Although the Berkshires are economically depressed, the cogeneration plant would not be a magic cure for the region's woes. During the construction of the plant, approximately 150 workers would be employed for roughly two years. After this initial construction period, however, the plant would require only 28 employees -- hardly enough to remedy local unemployment.

Another argument made for the plant is that it would increase local tax revenues. True, the Meridian project would increase tax revenues for the town by approximately $500,000 per year. Despite this increase in tax dollars, however, the plant would be unlikely to stimulate additional industry in the Berkshires because there exists no large demand for its product. Meridian would merely be producing a slightly more efficient version of a product which is already in adequate supply.

Aside from economic concerns, there are numerous other valid fears about the proposed power plant. It would occupy 15 acres of riverfront land, a commodity which many town residents feel is already in dangerously short supply. In addition, the plant would be an eyesore visible throughout much of Williamstown. The main building of the plant would be 70 feet tall at its highest point, while the cooling tower would stretch 175 feet from the earth. Thompson Chapel, the highest building in the immediate vicinity, is only 144 feet tall. From its imposing height, the cooling tower would also emit a giant plume of steam, another aesthetically displeasing feature.

The plant would be connected to local electric companies with wires above and below ground. The wires above the surface would also detract from Williamstown's scenic beauty. Although the plant supposedly would not produce excessive amounts of noise, the turbine would be audible outside the boundaries of the plant. How ironic that a project designed to revitalize the local economy could do so much to hurt the tourist industry!

Williamstown residents and the Board of Selectmen should reject Meridian's proposal. Neither the town nor the college needs a monster of an industrial plant producing a commodity which is already being supplied. The proposed plant would not significantly improve the region's economic problems, nor would it provide an incentive for other businesses to move here. Williamstown should resist the vision of instant economic miracles, and not allow this dinosaur to mar its scenic beauty.

Coke boycott would hurt South Africa

To the editor:

Of course we must boycott Coke and immediately remove all of its products from our campus. The fact remains that the Coca-Cola Company is a huge corporation whose sole aim is to reap large profits -- and some of those profits come from South Africa. That's a fact. Coke still pays the racist Pretoria regime some $60 million annually in profit taxes -- taxes that go towards funding the security forces, the "koevoeten," RENAMO, and so on and so on.

Face it, Coke is a useless product. We don't need it. South Africans surely don't need it. And the majority of South African blacks don't want to become dependent on imperialist Western industries.

Both the South African Council of Churches and COSATU, the largest black trade union in South Africa, have called for immediate economic sanctions against the white-minority government. That means, for example, boycotting Coke. And don't believe any of Coke's feeble PR gestures. Don't for a minute believe that Coke's board of trustees cares in the least for South African workers. Here in the United States, one of Coke's subsidiaries, Minute Maid, keeps its migrant workers in Florida in virtual slave-like conditions by paying them wages which are lower than the cost of food at the nearby (Coke-owned) stores. Money is the only thing corporations are after. Humanitarianism is just a tiny little trick which can boost sales if necessary. Sure, Coke wants the "world to sing in perfect harmony" -- but if they can still reap profits in a racist nation that is far from harmonious, you can bet they will. And therefore, we must boycott Coke now.

Of course we can't stop there. There are plenty more targets that need to be hit and his hard -- Shell, IBM... the list goes on -- and many of the companies on that list are in Williams' stock portfolio. Therefore, not only must we BOYCOTT NOW, but Williams must also DIVEST NOW!

The fight against apartheid is not an easy one, and with the big-money media against us, not a popular one either. But if you despise apartheid (as you should), then you must support it. Things are easy for us here at Williams. Removing all Coke products is such an easy step to take. And an effective one as well.

Anti-apartheid actions are hampered most by lack of media coverage. Cave in point: European anti-Sell actions. Shell has consistently violated a United Nations ban on petroleum sales by selling its products to South Africa's fascist armed forces.

But Shell is a powerful multinational. Thus the governments of Holland, West Germany and Denmark do all they can to keep reports of justified anti-Sell vandalism at a minimum in an effort to dishearten activists and to decrease public awareness of multinational involvement in South Africa.

But we need to raise public awareness. For a boycott to be effective, its reasons must be made known to the public. If an institution like Williams were to boycott the Coca-Cola Company, many others would soon follow suit. Anti-apartheid activities would be given new life. And this is necessary. Boycotting Coke is by no means a radical step. It's an easy step; the college could remove all Coke products on a single afternoon. And we must pressure them to do so, before more radical actions become necessary...

Blood, sweat and tears: It's interview time in the Big Apple!

by Dan Skwire

The convoys of buses leaving the Williams Inn for Boston and New York City over mid-winter break bear more resemblance to a giant Williams College field trip than anything else. Sure, we all know how many hundreds of students here live in New York or Massachusetts, but twice that number must head off to Beantown or the Big Apple each vacation.

Making my first trip to New York since the Dark Ages of high school, I felt conspicuously naive as I gaped wide-eyed through the dingy window at the approaching skyline. I also felt a certain measure of dread when I pictured the job interview for a summer position at a Major Corporation that lay ahead that afternoon. There I was, just another Midwestern kid traveling to the city to seek fame and fortune.

The bus ride was long, about five and a half hours. To my traveling companion, however, the trip seemed like a Sunday stroll after her six-hour odyssey from Smith to Williams the day before. Seems she had gotten bogged down in the miasma of Peter Pan Bus Lines, an operation where the vehicles have names like "Wendy" and "Tinkerbell," and the drivers are required to wear funny green suits.

J.M. Barrie nightmares notwithstanding, she had arrived at Williams late afternoon Sunday to find the campus looking like a ghost town in which even the ghosts had caught the early bus to the city. We had walked from the Williams Inn to Baxter Hall to Colonial Pizza to the Greylock Quad without seeing another soul, living or otherwise.

"Is this place always so quiet on Sundays?" she had asked.

"We are in Massachusetts," I had reminded her. "Puritan heritage and all that. You understand."

Finding scant entertainment in the Super Bowl holocaust, we had fallen asleep early, and risen with the sun to catch our bus. Now, as we descended into the Lincoln Tunnel, my companion awoke from her four-and-a-half-hour catnap to ask groggily, "Are we there yet?"

The bus emerged into the light of Manhattan, and when we pulled up to a stoplight, we could smell the excitement in the air. At least we thought it was excitement. Perhaps it was just Port Authority.

The bus was nearly an hour late getting to the city, so I didn't have much time before my interview. We caught a quick lunch at a quiet little place on the corner of Ninth and Fortieth. Finishing off our cheese Whoppers, we decided that my companion would claim our room at the Williams Club while I raced downtown to the Major Corporation.

Funny thing about Major Corporations, they make you dress like a wedding guest for your interview, but everyone there looks rumpled, sloppy and comfortable. Their jackets are off, ties undone, sleeves rolled up. Standing in a pressed suit and an impeccably knotted tie, I felt about as comfortable as a Christian in a lion's den.

"...come to this decision?" asked Clarence, ending my dreams of escape. Snapping back to consciousness, I responded and F. Lee Bailey, did their most to make me feel at home. Grilling me on every point of my school and work life, they had me scanning the room for ways to make up. I thought: There's probably a ledge outside this window. Maybe I could just...

"...come to this decision?" asked Clarence, ending my dreams of escape. Snapping back to consciousness, I responded the only way I could, I panicked.

Who? When? What decision? Could you repeat the question? I decided to hazard a guess.

"Uh, well, lifelong desire, great education, loyal, brave, trustworthy..." I muttered incomprehensibly. I glanced up at F. Lee to see him nodding at Clarence with raised eyebrows. They bought it!

"Well, Mr. Skwire, we've enjoyed talking to you. We mean that sincerely. So, harrumph, Nancy will show you the door and don't call us, et cetera, et cetera..."

Orateful for the opening, I grabbed my coat and fled out of the office, down the hall, onto Seventh Avenue, and off to the Williams Club, where my companion was recovering from a shopping spree that had left her Visa Card looking as worn and tattered as an ancient dollar bill.

Funny thing about the Williams Club, it's not that different from one of the row houses at Williams College. There's a distinguished wood-paneled library just inside the door, the bedrooms are small but quaint, and there are Maurice Prendergast and Thomas Hart Benton posters on every wall. The Williams logo is actually somewhat more visible at the Club than on campus. It appears on the soap, the shampoo, the matchbooks and even on the two plastic sheathings that are so carefully placed next to the sink. I felt very much at home.

So much at home that I was sorry to leave the next morning after my "complimentary" continental breakfast and morning paper -- The Wall Street Journal, of course. Giving the Visa card one final moment of glory, my companion and I checked out and headed off to Port Authority.

Funny thing about Port Authority, it looks nothing at all like Williams College. If you ask someone where you can buy a ticket for Williamstown, the response will be a confused shrug or a plying laugh. Luckily, we encountered a posse of Williams students looking like so many nine-year-olds being herded off to summer camp. Falling in line, we climbed aboard the bus and grabbed two seats in the Greylock Quad section. The bus began with about 60 people in Williams students on board. By the time it reached Great Barrington, there was only one passenger who couldn't tell an Eph from an elephant. We lost him in Pittsfield, and the excitement grew as the bus veered up Route 7 to the Inn. People were trading jokes and swapping stories. I could hear the strains of "Ninety-nine Bottles of Beer on the Wall" coming from the back rows.

When we arrived home around 9:30, we hiked to Baxter where I picked up my two days' worth of mail. A Weekly Calendar, a reminder about recycling, and a thick brown envelope. Slowly and cautiously, I tore open the envelope to discover a business letter from another Major Corporation.

"Dear Mr. Skwire," it read. "Thank you for your interest in our company. We have reviewed your resume and would like to schedule an interview for you in New York as soon as possible. Please call us if you have any questions."

Actually, I do have a question. If you Major Corporations are so rich and omnipotent, why, just once, can't you take the long bus ride, put on the fancy suit and talk in me when I'm relaxed, comfortable and confident? Believe me, I will do everything I can to make you feel right at home.

In Other Ivory Towers

Dartmouth College

Finding a place to sleep it off proved too much for Mil Lawler, 19, after one Saturday night, when the residents of a women's dormitory refused to let him stay. Lawler wandered from room to room in the early hours of the morning, telling one student that she was in his bedroom and demanding to sleep there. At her refusal to host him even after he had stripped to his boxers, Lawler stumbled down the hall with his bottle and attempted to break into other rooms. Another student wouldn't even let him stay on the ledge outside the fourth floor windows, and called campus police. Police were unable to find him, however, until a student discovered him in the janitor's closet in her bathroom.

More from Dartmouth

Students taking an organic chemistry test found a little more excitement than they had expected from aromatic compounds when two men streaked through the classroom wearing nothing but scarves over their faces. Students didn't seem too upset, and one aspiring organic chemist said it was a good lesson breaker. "An orgo test has never been so funny," said another student. Not to put down the efforts of the professor, who missed the event. "I thought it was just excited students," he said. Quite likely, although the magnitude of the streakers' excitement was not reported.

Trinity College

Williams may be isolated, but at least isolation avoids some of the problems faced by urban campuses such as that of Trinity College. The location of a Hartford, Connecticut prostitution center near Allen Place, an off-campus housing unit, has angered students who have been solicited by prospective customers. "There are people who will stop you if you don't have your book bag," said one student. Last year, police made 238 of the 336 arrests on prostitution charges in Hartford in this area near the Trinity campus. Concerned residents have received little more than sympathy from Trinity College President Overy, who is reportedly more concerned about drug problems. He has said that the prostitutes feed on the drug-dealing haven which is established near Allen Place, and that once the drugs are rooted out, the prostitutes will follow.

Clark University

Complete satisfaction or your money back. Not something you usually see on the menu at a dining hall, but Clark University and its food-service contractor have teamed up to give students that very option. The new plan promises a refund to be credited to a student's account if the student is not satisfied with the day's fare. Refunds will only be a final option after an unsatisfied student is offered the choice of the other meal options, including a specially prepared dinner. "If that doesn't satisfy the student, we'll refund the price of the meal. All we ask is that the student consider reasonable alternatives," said a Clark business manager. What students consider reasonable may depend on what else they can buy with the $1.66 for breakfast, $3.32 for lunch, or $4.99 for dinner.

Hidden from our view, far from the center of our campus, a crisis has been building in Williamstown. The problem has surfaced before, both here and in other places. We have dealt with it by burning it into the sky, dumping it into our oceans and burying it in the ground, but mostly we have tried to place the cause of our ultimate apocalypse outside of our collective memory. And now the problem rises again.

We have so contaminated the air that our every breath sucks in thousands of toxic chemicals. We have so saturated the oceans that our beaches are lined with dead marine life and medical waste. We have so polluted the ground that our water supplies are leached with poisons. Our previous failures to deal with the problem expose us to toxic chemicals when we breathe, bathe, drink and eat. The problem is garbage.

Our society is rapidly running out of places to put our trash. The National Solid Waste Management Association projects that 24 states will run out of landfill space in under 10 years. In Massachusetts, 80 percent of all landfills will be filled to capacity in under five years. In Northern Berkshire County, the Massachusetts Department of Environmental Protection has ordered the five largest landfills to be closed within two years. The problem is here and now and demands an adequate solid waste management policy to prevent the onset of the final human evolutionary process.

Our generation grew up with a cultural icon that warned us of the dire consequences of an inadequate solid waste management policy. His name is Oscar the Grouch, that odd member of Sesame Street society who lives in a garbage can, loves trash and sings in praise of solid waste. The Grouch's love of trash, however, has transformed him into the least congenial monster on Sesame Street. He is never in a good mood, which creates the common perception that the Grouch is downright rotten. Oscar is unfriendly because the citizens of Sesame Street have not developed an adequate solid waste management policy.

We would all probably be Grouches if our neighbors dumped their refuse in our backyards. If our society does not adopt an adequate solid waste management policy, we might all find ourselves sprouting green fur and being in bad moods all the time.

The Grouch Transformation will take place if our society continues to landfill as though there were no problem and continues to build new landfills when the old ones reach capacity. The first part of our transformation -- sprouting green fur -- will come from our continuous exposure to the poisonous byproducts of our society's sophisticated alienative "solutions" to landfilling, such as burning garbage "cleanly" and burying the unburnable toxic residues, dumping garbage in the ocean and dumping garbage in someone else's backyard when they aren't looking.

The second half of the transformation -- the permanent bad mood -- comes when society starts talking about the "solution" of building another landfill. No one likes to be associated with "trash" and they subsequently have a tendency to get green and grouchy at the idea of a landfill in their backyard. Soon everyone has turned green (ironically an environmentalist's true color) and gotten real grouchy. If Massachusetts hadn't adapted the Municipal Recycling Facility (MRF) to deal with the acute solid waste crisis in Western Massachusetts, you'd be sure to find a bunch of green Grouches running around the Berkshires by the end of 1991.

On January 16, the population of Williamstown joined 750,000 Western Massachusetts residents in 85 communities who have agreed to use MRF as part of their plan to deal with solid waste. These communities have required their residents to separate their trash into paper, glass and metals, and non-recyclables, including plastics, food and wax. The requirement is similar to pilot Mandatory Recycling Programs in Los Angeles, Minneapolis and Washington, D.C.

The Western Massachusetts program was projected to increase total area recycling from seven to 25 percent, assuming a meager 20 percent participation rate. We say meager because during the first two weeks of the Western Massachusetts program, participation rates as high as 90 percent have been reported. Western Massachusetts has seen an easy, effective way to repel the onset of the Grouch Transformation, and the region has acted. On February 15 the 2000 students at Williams College will join the 750,000 residents of Western Massachusetts in making our world a nicer place.

The MRF program could stop the flow of trash to landfills half, giving Massachusetts another five years before the Grouch Transformation takes effect. While this might seem like a huge measure, household separation sets the stage for a comprehensive solid waste reduction plan in Massachusetts.

Nevertheless, MRF has two drawbacks which prevent it from being an instant cure for the grouching of the populace. First, MRF is dependent on finding a steady market for recycled goods. Western Massachusetts communities are essentially donating their reusable trash to an entrepreneurial firm in Springfield, which must then find buyers for the recycled products. If there are no buyers, there could be a tremendous backlog of trash, which would make everyone as grouchy as ever.

Second, the MRF program is currently unable to process plastics. Disposal of plastics by incineration and landfilling are significantly contribute to the amount of toxic residues in our air and in our water supply. As long as we continue to dispose of artificial compounds by traditional methods, we cannot prevent the sprouting of green fur.

MassPIRG is currently working with the Recycling Initiative Campaign (RIC) to provide a comprehensive, state-wide solid waste management policy. RIC's basic objective is to encourage industry to participate in recycling efforts to overcome the weaknesses of MRF. RIC would require that packaging be made of 50 percent recycled material. Also, the packaging industry must come up with a method to start recycling plastics at a rate of 35 percent or switch to environmentally sound materials.

The campaign qualified an initiative question for the 1990 ballot. The Recycling Initiative Petition gathered 133,000 signatures, more than 2.5 times the number needed to qualify the question for the ballot. Clearly, RIC has widespread public support. Recycling is being accepted as the best alternative to avoid the Grouch Transformation.

If you want to help save our society from apocalyptic decline, there are several alternatives open to you. You can make a conscientious attempt to reduce the amount you waste. You can write a letter to Massachusetts state legislators encouraging them to endorse the Recycling Initiative Campaign at the MassPIRG Voter Registration Table next week. You can join the local Recycling Initiative Campaign by coming to the MassPIRG general interest meeting on February 21. Finally, as Freud reminds us, remember to love your Mother Earth.

CCS sees old problems in new ways

by Susan Gray

The unassuming red and gray sign on Spring Street and the two cramped offices atop a rickety staircase mark the activities of global significance taking place within the Center for Common Security. CCS is a nonprofit organization established in 1987 by two Williams College graduates, David Yaskulka '84 and Dominic Kulik '86.

The two act as directors and are aided by Andrea Walter '88, the CCS administrator, and Malini Mehra, a 1989 Smith graduate who is the center's outreach director. Together they explore new approaches to peace and national security and seek to further citizen participation in political activities.

"The Center for Common Security is training the next generation of Americans to seek creative solutions to global problems," Yaskulka and Kulik wrote in a description of CCS' activities. "In the nuclear age, threatening our adversaries dangerously undermines our own security. Further threats to our security are increasingly environmental, economic, and social. We must accept the challenge of ensuring each other's common survival."

CCS promotes a "non-provocative" defense with two components as an alternative to maintaining nuclear arsenals. With the political changes in Eastern Europe revealing the power that united civilians are capable of using against political regimes, CCS' ideas no longer seem as radical or visionary as they may have in 1987.

Changing military posture

The first component of their proposal involves shifting from an offensive military stance to a strictly non-provocative defense system.

"We propose 'transmarring' from an offensive to a strictly non-offensive, non-provocative defense system, emphasizing weapons that protect but can't reach others' borders," Yaskulka said.

The second component involves establishing a non-violent civilian-based defense, or CBD, in which civilians rather than military forces resist foreign aggression through non-violent, resistance-oriented means.

"The intent is to deter and defeat military invasion by denying potential aggressors any benefits of attack," Yaskulka said. "This is accomplished by defending social, economic and political institutions via strategic resistance and non-cooperation, by demoralizing invading troops, and by mobilizing the international community against the aggressors. In short, the civilian population is prepared to make domination and control impossible."

Yaskulka and Kulik emphasize creating functional alternatives to political problems, such as CBD, rather than simply reacting against such problems. They criticize the peace movement's messaging and protest-oriented tendencies.

Role of peace movement

"The peace movement can't simply march against missiles," the two wrote in an article for Metro magazine. "It must come up with a defense plan of its own, try to work out a system that can

by Rhonda Goodman

Dessima Williams, a visiting assistant professor of political science last year, spoke to students on Caribbean and Central American issues after a dinner of traditional Caribbean food at Rice House Wednesday, January 24.

Williams focused on the Panamanian issue, telling the story of constant United States intervention in Panama from the late 19th century through her pictures. She said that the U.S. policy of intervention was often justified by the idea that Central American people are children and cannot take care of themselves.

"If you asked why there are revolutions in Central America or why the U.S. invades Panama, [it goes back] to the old theory that they can't govern themselves or [that] the communist territory has to be stemmed," she said. She said that the U.S. invaded Panama to take the Panama Canal, which the U.S. has control of until the year 2000, and to establish democracy. Each time the United States has invaded Panama or any other Caribbean country, however, a revolution has always followed, Williams said.

U.S. interventions fail

"When outside forces go in and try to fix domestic arrangements, it doesn't work," she said. "There is a rebellion against that order. They [the U.S.] try to provide democracy, but get the exact opposite. The idea of oppression comes in. Democracy is not viable then."

Williams said the United States government seems to think that its power is more important than letting another country rule its own part of the world. She also claimed that the American media only share with citizens information which will portray the government in a good light, and do not tell the entire truth when reporting on many events.

She showed a picture of injured Panamanian people lying in the street after the U.S. intervention, and said the U.S. government prevented the Red Cross from helping the Panamanians (or 48 hours following the invasion, which was not reported in the media).

She said that the way to end United States intervention in Caribbean and Central American countries is through cultural and racial bonding, which will show a real representation of the world and will bring an awareness of what is really going on to U.S. citizens.

Williams, a former ambassador to Grenada, is now a political science professor at Radcliffe University, where she is currently working on her dissertation. Her talk was sponsored by the Black Student Union.

Beyond the Bubble

African National Congress legalized South African President F.W. de Klerk on Friday lifted a 30-year ban on the African National Congress (ANC) and declared that Nelson Mandela will be freed soon. The Pan Africanist Congress and the South African Communist Party were also legalized.

The ANC, the largest and strongest group opposing apartheid, followed a policy of nonviolent resistance to white rule for decades. After it was declared illegal in 1960, the organization began forming a military force in neighboring countries, headquartered in Lusaka, Zambia. It waged a campaign of bombings inside South Africa. The group has continued to gain strength and influence in spite of governmental efforts to crush the group.

Mandela, leader of the ANC, has been jailed for 28 years. His release is seen by many anti-government activists as a test of de Klerk's commitment to moving South Africa away from apartheid. "I wish to put it plainly that the Government has taken a firm decision to release Mr. Mandela unconditionally," de Klerk said Friday. Mandela's release date has not been set, however.

Within an hour of de Klerk's speech, which was delivered to Parliament in Cape Town, statements congratulating him for his courage were released. Crowds gathered in Johannesburg and Cape Town waving flags of the ANC and of the South African Communist Party. Although the mood was one of celebration, police units in Johannesburg used tear gas and night sticks to break up a march through the city. The national state of emergency regulations remain in effect.

USSR wants world vote on German unity

In an effort to slow moves towards German reunification, Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze proposed Friday putting the issue to a world referendum. He expressed concern over the "revival of sinister shadows of the past."

"All peoples, especially those of the Soviet Union, must have a guarantee that the war threat will never come from German soil," Shevardnadze said.

Earlier last week, President Mikhail S. Gorbachev seemed to soften his opposition to reunification. In fact, there were reports in East and West Germany that the Soviet leader was even backing this major change. Shevardnadze's proposal seems to demonstrate that Gorbachev's intentions were misinterpreted.

Bennett questions drug education

Williams graduate William J. Bennett '65, the nation's drug policy director, testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee that children are more likely to respond to aggressive law enforcement and assured punishment than to education. He painted a picture of young drug users as knowing users, not innocent victims, thereby rejecting the argument of many Democrats that education is the best solution to the nation's drug problems.

Willing to forego consumer choice."

The panelists generally seemed to favor German reunification. A member of the audience said, "We need a united Europe to secure the recent reforms."

Weiner said that German unification seemed almost inevitable when we look at history.

"A majority of the German people learned from history. It's rarely happened that a country with industrial development, dense population and a central location doesn't expand."

But Anderson said that because German expansion involves an upset in the European balance of power, West Germany needs to be careful.

"[West German Chancellor] Kohl is playing a mischievous game in refusing to acknowledge the borders of the Polish corridor," he said. "He seems to be looking at the upcoming general elections at the end of this year and catering to a hardcore constituency." The panel concluded on a hopeful yet cautionary note towards the changes in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union.

Middlebury frats must admit women

College Press Service

Middlebury College's six fraternities must begin admitting women members by 1991 or shut down, the Vermont school trustees voted January 13.

The board stopped short of a special task force recommendation to abolish all fraternities on the Middlebury campus by May 30, a fate that has stricken houses at several other schools recently, including Colby, Amherst, Gettysburg and Castleton State colleges.

deter and defend us from potential aggression, while at the same time, not provoke aggression with its offensive capabilities."

In addition to brainstorming ideas on their own, Yaskulka and Kulik conducted over 150 workshops a year, sharing their ideas with citizens and stimulating involvement in the consideration and creation of solutions to global problems.

"The strength of any democracy rests on...most of all the active participation of its people. It would be a mistake to associate Oliver North's Iran-Contra actions with 'patriotism'. The true patriot works to empower more and more people to participate politically," Yaskulka and Kulik wrote in Metro.

CCS' main target is college campuses. Yaskulka and Kulik consider today's youth our nation's greatest resource, but perceive them as lacking in an ability to take a meaningful part in the democratic system—a situation engendered primarily through our educational system.

"Today's young adults are leaving college with neither the inspiration nor the creative capacity to address the most pressing problems of our age," Yaskulka and Kulik wrote in a 1990 profile of the center's activities. "The predominant passive learning model in our schools leads to a disenfranchised populace and a weaker nation."

Student-initiated class

As a positive step towards resolving this entrenched, conditioned passivity, Yaskulka and Kulik promote to colleges a fully credited, student-initiated class, in which students lead lessons and direct discussion.

"An academically rigorous method, the CCS model challenges students to reposition themselves as learners, teachers, and problem solvers in the classroom. They develop leadership skills by formulating the syllabus and by leading class through a unique student-facilitated format," Yaskulka and Kulik wrote in CCS' profile.

Williams' "Nonviolence and Social Change" class serves as Yaskulka and Kulik's model. They both took the course as undergraduates and credit it as the turning point in their own development as active citizens.

"It was definitely the most exciting thing I've ever done," said Yaskulka.

If they'll follow the order. If the answer is no, college officials will shut the house down to use it for student residences, Nief said.

"It's unfortunate," said Jonathan Brant, executive director of the National Interfraternity Council. "It's inconsistent coming from a college with a liberal arts tradition."

Fraternities came under scrutiny after Vermont's drinking age was raised to 21 two years ago, Nief said, and the houses became hot spots.

"Social life at Middlebury College was being dominated by institutions that were already gender restrictive. Sexism was a constant complaint. Women didn't feel comfortable there, and sometimes they didn't feel safe there," Nief said.

Middlebury has no sororities.

Interim Student Government Association President Louise Totten said the decision reflects an overwhelming vote last year calling for retention of a reformed fraternity system.

Yaskulka predicts that the 1990 budget will stand at about a quarter million to half a million dollars.

In 1991, the first annual Leadership and Education Institute, an intensive summer institute for academic entrepreneurs, will commence. CCS is inviting 30 undergraduates from around the country to Williams to participate in the art and science of education for powerful citizenship.

CCS is expanding ideologically as well. Yaskulka is currently working on incorporating military students into the dialogue on common security by conducting workshops at military schools and bases. Kulik is concentrating on expanding the role of Afro-American participation. Walters and Malini are focusing on strengthening the participation of women.

"We emphasize working with people generally excluded from the security debate. We emphasize working across previously accepted ideological boundaries," Yaskulka said. CCS encourages interested students to drop in and learn about its work and ideas.

CCS rapidly expanding

CCS is a growing organization. By the end of February, the center will move across the street into a larger five-office home in the old Williams Bookstore building. Their annual budget, funded by private foundations and Williams College, has quadrupled since CCS's inception.

Proposed cogeneration plant raises concerns and fears among residents

Ecological Front, a local fledgling Green party, will be petitioning students in Baxter Thursday, February 8 about the potential dangers.

Such concerns may be unnecessary, however. "The facts are the community is protected by a comprehensive environmental and energy review including a full environmental impact report prepared and available to the public before major state permits are granted," Harper said.

"DEP controls us to degrees that are unbelievable. They've got their team of lawyers that go through every 'it' and every 'I' make sure they're all crossed. We can't do anything unless it meets all of the latest—and that's important—at least to meet all of the latest and most stringent rules.

"And also in these systems we are using what is called BACT—Best Available Control Technology. BACT means that it is the state of the art for nitrous oxide control," Harper said at the roundtable discussion which The Advocate transcribed.

Zoning laws

The land which Meridian hopes to purchase is designated as a "business campus" under local zoning laws. Loomis said he believes that the proposed plant is a violation of the letter and spirit of the zoning laws.

"If the town wants industry, why not bring some clean industry to the town? This plant would be two-thirds the size of Yankee Atomic. Do we really want that in the Village Beautiful?" Loomis said.

The group of citizens opposing the plant claims that the Williamstown Board of Selectmen has been too silent about the issue.

"The selectmen haven't told the people anything. Meanwhile, they have been using time and town money to negotiate with a large Boston corporation. Where do their loyalties lie?" Brian Coan '92, a candidate for selectman last spring, said.

A public hearing to discuss the proposed plant will be held at the Williamstown Central Schools Monday, February 12, at 7:30 p.m. At this meeting the town's Planning Board will begin considering the proposal. Meridian officials will have a chance to explain their power plant proposition, and a group of citizens opposing the proposition will present a petition stating their views.

Fewer minority students enrolled in U.S. universities over last ten years

College Press Service

Despite intensified recruitment efforts, fewer minority students enrolled in U.S. colleges in 1988 than in 1987, the American Council on Education reported January 14.

This drop, discovered by the Washington, D.C. based umbrella group for college presidents in their annual head count of minority students, continued a decade-long slide in minority student enrollments nationwide. The problem was most prevalent among blacks and Hispanics.

In its "Annual Status Report: Minorities in Higher Education," ACE found that in 1988 only 28 percent of the nation's college-age black people attended college. This number was down from 30 percent in 1987. By contrast, more than one third of the college-age African Americans took college classes in 1976.

Debrah Carter, co-author of the report, attributed the decline in part to growing numbers of middle-class black men opting to join the armed forces instead of enrolling in college.

Carter also found that, while the proportion of college-age Hispanics attending school increased from 28.5 percent in 1987 to 30.9 percent in 1988, the figure still fell far short of the 35.8 percent recorded in 1976.

"Since the mid-1970's, the college participation of African Americans and Hispanics has been a picture not of progress, but of major regression," the report said.

Opting for military over college

Director of ACE's Office of Minority Concerns Blandina Ramirez speculated that many black males confronted by higher college admissions standards might have found enlisting in the military more palatable than taking out loans and going into debt to go to college.

"Our current financial aid programs are not working to encourage low- and moderate-income students to go to college," Ramirez said.

ACE also found that black women are more likely to go to college than black men. In 1988, 25 percent of college-age black men were enrolled in higher education institutions, while 30.5 percent of black women attended college.

Ramirez also noted that fewer blacks, Hispanics, and Native Americans are earning degrees in education. This trend dims hopes for bringing more minority teachers into the system.

Some states have had more success than others. Illinois state officials reported on Jan. 16 that minority enrollment at Chicago State, Western Illinois, Northeastern Illinois, Governor's State and Eastern Illinois universities increased by 2.1 percent in 1989.

Record numbers of minority students, moreover, are taking college-level courses in high schools nationwide, a separate report by the College Board, a New York-based educational association, found in December.

Of the 310,000 students taking Advanced Placement classes last May, nearly 20 percent were either black, Hispanic, Asian American, or Native American, almost triple the number five years ago.

OPEN 9-5 DAILY

DNA SCIENCE WORKSHOP AT SMITH COLLEGE

Students and faculty of NECUSE* member institutions are invited to attend a two day workshop at Smith College to learn basic DNA fingerprinting techniques. The workshop is designed to enable students and faculty to exchange ideas and to learn new techniques in a laboratory environment separate from the regular academic program and conducive to small group interaction. All expenses for participants are paid by NECUSE, including travel, lodging, meals and participation fee. A maximum of 20 participants can be accommodated so early registration is recommended. Preference will be given to science students and faculty with a background in biology or biochemistry. Interested students and faculty from NECUSE member institutions should or call for information:

Professor Philip Reid
Department of Biology
Smith College
Northampton, MA 01063

New management plans revitalization of Mohawk Theatre

by Tammie Smith

In November of 1938, the Mohawk Theatre in North Adams opened as an E. M. Loew's flagship. Once one of several movie palaces and vaudeville houses on North Adams' Main Street, it is now perhaps the only one left in the Berkshires. For years it has been struggling to compete with the big multi-screen movie houses, but new management may be able to revive the Mohawk.

Michael Thornton and Maria Watson, the new directors of the Mohawk, first saw the theatre in the summer of 1988. "It's something that any logical, sane businessman wouldn't touch with a ten foot pole," admitted Thornton.

"But we're in show business," Watson said. Both have extensive experience as theatre professionals in New York City. Officially Thornton and Watson are the directors of the Mohawk Theatre Guild, Inc., a non-profit organization dedicated to saving the Mohawk Theatre. Currently the theatre is being leased, but the Guild has an option to buy the theatre if the project is successful. Thornton is also on the board of directors of the Northern Berkshire Council for the Arts.

The Mohawk features a huge 25-by-25-foot screen which cranks up to the ceiling at the start of a show. It seats 1250, including 350 seats in the still-accessible balcony. Though a little run-down, the interior is still the original Art Deco design. While they may look a little shabby, the seats are reputed to be among the most comfortable around.

Thornton described plans for the Mohawk to become a multi-dimensional house which will feature children's theatre, movies and festivals. He added that an important aspect of the Mohawk is that it is to be community-based. "We're trying to include the community in everything that we do," he said.

Currently the theatre is showing Back to the Future II. Tickets are only $2.50, $1.50 on Monday and Thursday. Thursday nights the Mohawk sponsors a teen dance from 7 to 9 p.m., complete with a d.j. Several children's theatre projects are in progress, involving the schools in the North Adams area.

North Adams' Mohawk Theatre, which opened in 1938, may be the only remaining large-screen movie palace in the Berkshires. (Thomas)

"It's going to be a slow build until summer, when we'll open the Musical Theatre in July," Thornton said.

In the meantime the directors hope to involve local students in internship programs as the theatre is renovated.

Thornton indicated that future plans include inviting solo acts like Arlo Guthrie, B.B. King, or Livingston Taylor.

Williams students may recall viewing the Rocky Horror Picture Show at the Mohawk this fall. The showing was a joint effort between the directors and a Williams student.

"People were on top of the balcony throwing rolls of toilet paper and squirting guns," Chris Walker '93 said of the event.

The directors are currently considering making the Rocky Horror Picture Show a monthly feature. They are also considering several double features, such as a Saturday Night Fever/Crease special.

"It's going to be completely eclectic," Thornton explained. "There'll be no one explanation for us."

"It has character," Margaret Lee '93 said. "It's definitely worth renovating." For now, Thornton urges the community to experience the Mohawk. "It will be theatre the way it used to be, with the best popcorn around," Thornton said.

Dance program expands curriculum, facilities

by Jenna Cummings, Blithe Holcomb, Francine McKenzie

"You yelled at me and beat me up...but it was fun."

-Nakesha Williams '92 to Obo Addy

These words reflect the sentiments of many students at Williams who are becoming involved in the Dance Program. For some students, this is their first experience with dance. For others, it is a continuation of years of involvement with the art form.

Members of the Williams College Dance Company spend as much as ten hours per week in technique classes, improvisational workshops, and original choreography, with countless hours of rehearsal just before performances. This original choreography, along with some faculty work, forms the substance of the performance. Works-In-Progress showings which culminate in the Annual Spring Concert. Many students begin their involvement with dance as a means of fulfilling their physical education requirements, and become so enthusiastic about it that they continue to participate. Some eventually join the Company.

African dance

Contrary to popular opinion, dancers at Williams are not exclusively female. Men are once again becoming involved, as are members of the non-Williams community. This was especially evident in the African dance and music winter study class, taught by Obo Addy, Assistant Professor of Music Ernest Brown, and Coordinator of Dance Sandra Burton. Obo Addy is a Ghanaian master drummer, who now resides in Portland, Oregon. His father was a Wone priest (or "Father of the Spirits") who used dance and music in his spiritual work. Addy worked at the Arts Council of Ghana for many years before emigrating to the U.S. This year was Addy's second time teaching this class at Williams. "I enjoy working with Williams students," Addy said. The response of the students to his instruction was both positive and enthusiastic. This year's performance was more of a production than the last, probably because the structure of the class was also different from what it was last year. This year, the group was separated into dancers and musicians, with Burton assisting with the dancers and Brown working with the musicians.

Modern and traditional

Addy said he felt that it was this assistance which made the class run more smoothly this year, and commented that the students were remarkably adept at learning the pieces despite the difference in rhythmic styles. The items were a synthesis of modern and traditional African dance and music, with dance and drum solos by Burton, Addy and members of the winter study class. The popularity of this style was demonstrated by the enthusiastic reception by the large and diverse audience.

Burton has actively promoted African dance here at Williams. She has been at Williams for seven years and in that time has also taught classes in beginning modern and served as the advisor to the Dance Company.

Burton is also on the dance faculty at Bennington College, and this year pioneered a course in dance history at Williams with another Bennington professor, Susan Spornati. The course was offered by the theater department to both Williams and Bennington students, and many of the students from Williams appreciated the intercollegiate experience.

In addition to Burton, there are three other dance instructors: Gary Sjakowski, accompanist; Judy Drozd, ballet instructor; and Peggy Florin, modern dance instructor. Florin, Burton and Sjakowski are presently rehearsing, along with the Dance Company, an original work to be shown in collaboration with the exhibit of AIDS photographs currently in WCMA. The work will be performed in the galleries of the museum in March.

Revamped studio

The instructors now have better facilities with which to work at Williams. The dance studio in Lascell Gymnasium has been developed from a basketball court to a performance space including a specially designed floor. The lighting system, portable mirrors and barres have not yet been installed, however. These improvements will put Williams on a par with other institutions of its kind in terms of quality facilities for the arts.

Inter-departmental collaboration is a common feature of the work done by students in the dance program. A collaboration with the Williams College Museum of Art is in rehearsal for performance in February.

A more regular and better known result of inter-departmental work is Kusika, the Williams College African-American Dance and Music Ensemble. Kusika was founded by Brown, Burton, and Gary Sjakowski, accompanist for the Dance program. Kusika means "to create" in the Shona language.

The group is involved in heightening awareness of African and African-American dance and music traditions, as well as creating original works out of those traditions. Since September, Kusika has been involved in many performance events. In October, the group conducted a chapel service with the Chaplains' Office entitled "A Celebration of the Human Spirit."

Kusika was invited to participate in the International Club's concert and the Martin Luther King Jr. Day service. More recently, they participated in the performance of the African dance and music winter study class.

A different culture

The group offers an opportunity for students, both dancers and "non-dancers," to be involved physically in the experience of a different culture. Many students have been with Kusika since its inception last year and as the repertoire expands, so does the enthusiasm.

Another facet of dance at Williams is guest performances sponsored by the Dance Society. Some of the visitors this past year included: Robbie McCauley, performance artist and storyteller; the Goodwill Chinese Youth Mission; and Susan Marshall and Company. These artists represent a caliber usually difficult to attract to an institution the size of Williams.

The popularity of dance at Williams is evident in the activities of students not formally affiliated with the Dance Company. This year, for the first time, more than one Winter Study course was offered in the area of dance. Assistant Professor of Biology Lee Venolia and Assistant Professor of Physics Andy Redfield of the taught a class in American and European folk dance. The resulting performance/contradance was well-attended, and the live caller and band added novelty to the experience.

On the same day, Caitlin Osborne '91 and Baird Jarman '92 presented the results of their Winter Study 99 on modern social dance at AMT Downstage. In addition, there were four Free University offerings in different types of social dance: Afro-American social dance, jitterbugging, salsa, and merengue and sevillanas.

Nation's freshmen politically active

College Press Service

This year's freshmen are more conservative about drugs and drinking, more liberal about abortion and national policy issues, and more prone to hit the streets to demonstrate than their predecessors, a national survey of entering college freshmen found.

"While student attitudes seem to be moving in a conservative direction on the issues of drugs and crime, their views on most other issues are changing in a decidedly liberal direction," said Alexander Astin, the University of California at Los Angeles professor who directs the annual survey.

Along with the American Council on Education, Astin each year asks more than 200,000 students at 403 campuses around the country what they think about current issues and social problems.

This year, a record number of freshmen—36.7 percent—said they had participated in an organized political demonstration during their senior year in high school.

Astin, who began the surveys in 1966

during the heyday of student activism, noted this year's freshmen are the most politically active ever.

In addition, an all-time high percentage of them thought there was a very good chance they'd join a demonstration of some kind while they were in college. "The trend of 'materialism' and 'meism' hasn't changed," Astin said. "But there are a lot of special interest groups around to protest."

Students seem most interested in joining environmental groups. For the fifth consecutive year, an increased number of freshmen agreed with the statement that the federal government is not doing enough to control environmental pollution.

"These trends show not only that most students want more governmental action in the environmental field, but that increasing numbers of them are willing to become personally involved in the effort," Astin said.

Students have already begun to get involved. In October, students from more than 250 campuses invaded the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill in hopes of starting a national environmental movement.

Among the other big attitude changes in the survey is a jump in the number of students supporting abortion from 57 percent in 1988 to 64.7 percent in 1989. "An abrupt change in student attitudes of this magnitude in just one year is most unusual," Astin said. "It may well reflect the students' growing concern about the Supreme Court's position on this highly charged topic."

Support for a national health care plan to cover health care costs grew to 75.8 percent of the freshmen, compared to only 60.5 percent in 1985.

A surprising all-time low—16.7 percent—agreed that marijuana should be legalized, while an all-time high—77.8 percent—said that employers should be allowed to require drug testing.

"That was a shock to me because, in general, students are supportive of civil liberties. I think this is another reflection of the drug hysteria being whipped up by politicians," Astin said.

There are many reasons why the Big Apple is considered to be the best place to launch a business career. Take, for example, the Price Waterhouse/New York University business program for liberal arts graduates.

It is a challenging and competitive 15 months to be sure. But it is time well spent. You'll spend your days working on the professional staff of the New York office of Price Waterhouse. And some nights and two summers attending the New York University Graduate School of Business Administration, where you can obtain an MS in accounting. Then, if you like, you can continue on for your MBA.

Even while attending NYU full-time, you will remain on full salary at PW. When you complete the program, you will have earned an advanced degree from one of the country's top business schools. You will also have gained invaluable practical experience working for one of the leading business advisory firms in the world. Experience which includes interacting with client executives on important business problems.

If you think you might be interested in the upcoming program, you should plan on taking your GMATs no later than March of 1990.

And to learn more about this truly unique career and educational opportunity, and to meet some of the participants currently in the program, please sign up at your career services office for the upcoming interview.

Women's hoops survives home scare by Cardinals

The Ephwomens finally pulled into the lead with eleven minutes left in the half, as Martha Lucy '91 forced a turnover and cashed in with a basket, in the process drawing a foul. Her three points gave the Ephs an 11-9 lead, which soon swelled to a 15-11 margin.

Good rebounding and strong outside shooting helped the Ephwomens maintain their lead, as did an excellent defensive effort. Lucy's hustle and quick hands created several turnovers, and Kris Broadhurst '92 added her soft shooting touch to fuel the Williams offensive power. With under three minutes left in the half, a series of bad passes by the Ephwomens gave Wesleyan the chance for which it had been waiting, and the Williams lead was cut down to 20-19.

A halftime edge

Kerry Mularczyk '93, one of the most promising freshmen on the team, brought the Ephs' lead back up to three, and Broadhurst followed up with an easy inside shot. Meg Brown '91, who frustrated the Cardinals all afternoon with her long arms and quick hands, sank one free throw and hauled in the rebound of her second shot to set up another Williams bucket. The first half ended with the Ephwomens enjoying a 27-20 advantage, with Broadhurst blazing a trail with six points.

When the teams returned to the court for the second stanza, Chandler had filled up. However, the loud support for Williams was silenced within the first two minutes of the half as an offensive campaign by Wesleyan eliminated the Eph lead.

As Wesleyan erased its seven-point deficit, bad passing by Williams only added to the flood. With 17 minutes left in the half, the game was tied up 27-27. The tension continued unabated throughout the first ten minutes of the half, as the teams answered each other shot-for-shot and inched their way to a 31-31 deadlock.

With 13 minutes left in the game, Wesleyan got its first lead since the early moments of the game, as a foul shot put them up 34-33. The Ephwomens responded quickly, as Brown canned two foul shots, which were soon followed by a six-footer by Becca Borden '91. Williams built on its lead, pulling ahead 43-38 on a streak led by good defense and Lucy's ball-handling, along with breakaway lay-ups and a three-point shot by Broadhurst. However, Wesleyan refused to be counted out of the game and, with sharp rebounding under the basket, they whittled away at the Ephs' lead once again. As the lead shrank to 48-46, the Williams fans were right behind their team, as every Cardinal foul shot was accompanied by hoos and "ah-hall" calls. And the refs certainly didn't escape the consternation of the crowd any more than Wesleyan.

With two minutes left in the game, both sides really began to hustle. Williams stepped up its pace, pressing on defense and driving hard on offense in hopes of maintaining its slim lead. A shot by Broadhurst gave the Ephs a 56-51 lead, but with a minute and a half left, Mularczyk fouled out.

The friction in the game was only intensified by the coach, as Eph mentor Nancy Roberts disputed Mularczyk's foul situation with the referee. A quick rebuke and warning from the ref, however, forced tempers down a notch. Kate Sharkey '93 entered the game in Mularczyk's place and the game continued.

With under a minute left in the game the scoreboard read 56-55, with Williams still hanging on to its fragile lead and Wesleyan coming on strong. Wesleyan's Kristin Dilworth put her squad on top 57-56 with thirty seconds left. Williams regained its possession on a jump ball and Brown drew a shooting foul with only six ticks remaining on the clock. Brown sank the first shot to tie it up, and with her second shot brought the Ephs ahead once again 58-57.

After a frenzy in the Cardinal ended to a jump ball, Wesleyan rebounded the ball from the side with one second left in the game, and most of the players on the court were locked in a traffic jam outside the three-point circle. A quick pass, however, beat the clock and found its way into the hands of a wide-open Wesleyan guard, who shot from right under the basket as the fans and the Williams squad watched frozen in horror. Just as the buzzer rang there came an audible sigh of relief followed by shrieks of joy as Wesleyan missed the easiest shot in basketball and lost the game by one point.

The victory for the Ephwomens reflected their improvement and hard work, as they enter February on a positive note. The team travels to North Adams today for a showdown with the neighboring Mohawks.

J.V. hoops fall to Cardinals, see modest winning streak end

by Rashid Curtis

The J.V. hoopsters were in a bit of despair as they saw their hopes for capturing the Little Three Championship, the old competition between Williams, Wesleyan, and Amherst, dwindle away with Saturday night's loss to Wesleyan.

Wesleyan was able to stop the junior hoopsters' modest two-game winning streak with a 60-57 victory. It was a hard loss for the Ephemen not only because the team's Little Three hopes evaporated, but also because of all the effort that went into the two prior victories over Union College and Albany University.

The team gave an all-out effort and was fueled by pride in denying Union the pleasure of two victories over the Ephemen in one season. Williams was led to victory by their two star freshman guards, Pat Duquette and Adam Brandt, each of whom contributed 23 points to send Union home on the embarrassing end of a decisive score.

Two days later the Ephemen repeated their performance, this time led by power forward John Engel '93. John slipped in 23 points and snatched 11 rebounds to help fire the team to victory over its Albany opponents. Duquette and Brandt combined for 31 points and some clutch baskets.

What happened against the Cardinals? Coming off mid-winter break, a couple of players were plagued with sickness and missed practices. More importantly, only three of the starting five scored, and in the first five minutes of the second half, Wesleyan made a 10-0 run that forced the Ephemen to play catch up for the remainder of the game.

It seems that if the J.V. squad is going to be serious about winning it must do two things: first, get all the starters involved in the offense, and, second, not allow opposing teams to get into positions to win games. The Little Three is lost, but the team can still end with a winning season.

the races, but [am] looking forward to the outdoors season," she said.

The women runners capped off the day by winning the mile and two mile relays. Gray succinctly summed up the meet by saying, "The women looked good."

The men had a tougher time with their competition, but in the end they also prevailed. The men ran well on what senior captain Dale Johnson called the slowest track in New England. But the fact did not hamper the field event entries, as Walker won the long jump, and Steven Moran '91, in what Farwell described as "a great comeback," won the pole vault.

The key to the purple-and-gold victory was the one-two finish of Anthony Werner '93 and Brian Coan '92 in the 3000m. Both runners were running stride for stride until the last lap, when Werner made a strong move to pull away for the victory. Igharo hopped, skipped and jumped to victory in the triple jump. The Williams two mile relay team brought home the final victory for the men's team to help seal the days victory.

Other meet highlights included Jeff Cooper's tip-and-tuck battle in the 1500m, from which he emerged with a strong second place and a time of 4:14. Derek Calsam '93 finished second in the high jump with a leap of 6'3", as he saw a possible victory evaporate when a jumper from Westfield set the field house record with a leap of 6'8".

Coach Farwell said he was very pleased with the men's performance, noting especially the victory over Springfield, a team that has given the Ephemen considerable trouble in the past.

This weekend the Eph runners will stay home to face archrivals Wesleyan and Amherst and several other teams in what promises to be an exciting afternoon of track and field action.

Skaters drop close ones to Little 3 rivals

by Kathleen Lapey

Hopes of a Little Three title slipped through the fingers of the women's hockey club over the last two weeks, as the team suffered through a 2-1 defeat against Amherst and a 3-2 loss to Wesleyan, after posting a 4-2 win over Skidmore.

On Saturday Williams faced the Wesleyan

squad, a group of women rumored to be rough and dirty on the ice. After a close, evenly matched contest, Williams wound up on the slim end of a 3-2 score. The first period was a frustrating one, as Wesleyan surprised everyone with two quick goals and seemed to dominate the purple zone. Yet things turned around in the second period, as senior tri-captain Kristin Moomaw's aggressive defensive prowess brought down Wesleyan's captain. The stunned Wesleyan club slowed down as Williams picked up speed. With a minute to go in the period, tri-captain Kara Lynch '90 sneakily hooked the puck into Wesleyan's net, assisted by her puck-hungry teammate Tierney Sage '92. The third period opened up with Lynch once again on the prowl in the Cardinal zone, as she weaved around skater after skater and sent the puck flying into the net for her second goal of the afternoon. Wesleyan was clearly agitated and harassed goalie Sue Pitcher '90 with shot after shot, to no avail.

Finally, however, they managed to get one into the Williams net, posting a 3-2 lead with twelve minutes left on the clock. Williams fought until the end but could not score, despite many opportunities. The stars of the day were Pitcher, with a personal best 36 saves, and Lynch, who played both offense and defense with ease and no fatigue. Also noteworthy was the play of Lenke Wood '92, whose defensive tactics in front of the Williams net saved her squad repeatedly, and Tamiko Kido '92 who displayed her usual defensive loyalty.

The wrong mindset? Before the mid-winter break, the overconfident Williams team lost to an improved Amherst squad 2-1 as punchy tri-captain, Jill Magnuson '90 notched the lone Williams goal of the game. It was a game lost by attitude, not ability. Earlier in the week, Briggs' troops played up to their potential and slammed Skidmore 4-2. Despite the rough play and multiple penalties of Skidmore, Williams did not play down to their level and executed one of its best games of the season. Standouts were Lynch, who scored two goals, Magnuson, who added one, and Hilary Klotz '90, whose steady defensive play at the point inspired Williams offensively while simultaneously anchoring the defense. Also noteworthy was Val Granfield '92, who scored off of a perfect pass from Holly Christoferson '92.

With four games left in the season, Williams looks forward to future wins and revenge against Wesleyan. Yet, fans should not overlook the rookie "developmental team."

"After two tough losses, we're hoping that the developmental team, with a win Tuesday afternoon against the Salisbury High School boys, will inspire the varsity that night in a tough battle against Colgate," assistant coach Ian Lapey said.

Senior tri-captain Jill Magnuson controls the biscuit in Saturday's home game against Wesleyan. The women saw their hopes for a share of the Little Three crown evaporate with a 3-2 loss. (Thomas)

end of conditioning. Although we weigh in tomorrow afternoon, practice will not be a light weight workout, but a real practice. This is presumably because we need all the work we can get in preparation for Springfield on Thursday night.

Thursday, February 1, 11:30 a.m. Practice yesterday was not much fun. Everybody came in well over weight, due to the promise of "real" practice. So the workout was pretty long, with most of the team practicing in sweat-soaked plastic suits. We held challenge matches, which are five-minute bouts to determine who will wrestle first string at each particular weight class in competition. In this case they covered two matches, because the Plymouth State tournament on Saturday follows closely on the heels of the Springfield match.

How do we prepare for a home match? We eat an early dinner at 4:00 at the beautiful Driscoll dining facility, and then show up in the locker room between 6:00 and 6:30, giving us plenty of time to get nervous before our 7:30 match. We face long odds tonight, as Springfield has one of the best wrestling programs in New England. They shut a team out 59-0 the other day, and the maximum score of a wrestling defeat is 60-0. We should be able to win at least three matches, however.

Thursday, February 1, 10:00 p.m. We were destroyed by Springfield, 35-5. Our only victory was turned in by Sean "Zippy" Glynn '91 at 167 pounds. There isn't much to say about the match, except that we were dominated by a tough and deep team. Some of their wrestlers weren't even starters, but were still able to post close victories over some of our best wrestlers. It seems odd that we added them to our schedule. The match showed nothing, except that we can't compete with a Division II jock school in one of its best sports.

Now we have to make weight for the Plymouth State tournament by 3:00 tomorrow afternoon. We can't have a practice since we have classes, so we have to come in between classes and lose the weight. Immediately after weigh-in we depart on a five-hour journey to the wilds of New Hampshire.

Sunday, February 4, 2:00 p.m. Following weigh-in, nine wrestlers and two coaches piled into a school van and drove off into a driving snowstorm that followed us all the way up to Plymouth. We travelled via Route 2 to 495 past North Andover, which is something like driving from Williamstown to Florida by way of Montana.

We arrived much later than expected, so the coaches missed the seeding meeting, where wrestlers are evaluated by record and seeded based on their expected performance. We settled for the night at the luxurious Red Carpet Inn, complete with a game room and cable TV (no HBO). After some negotiation, we managed to get pizza delivered to our rooms, but the stuff turned out to be even grainer than Colonial.

We were awakened the next morning by a 7:00 wake-up call and made our way groggily to the tournament. The wrestling began at 9:00 and concluded about 13 hours later. Our results were decent; Bill Sullivan '93 at 118 pounds and Jim Mawn '92 at 158 pounds both captured third place.

Several members of the team were just shy of placing in the top four, and nobody went wireless on the day. Most of us wrestled three or four times, so by the end of the day we were all incredibly sore and tired. Our requests to stay over with the Plymouth State team fell on deaf ears, however, as Coach Caron drove us back on another five-hour trip through yet another snowstorm.

Looking ahead, there are three dates left in the season. This coming Saturday we travel to Rhode Island College to wrestle nationally-ranked R.I.C. and Bowdoin. The Little Three tournament will be held at Wesleyan during Winter Carnival. We should win for the first time in 27 years. Finally, we'll be journeying up to Plymouth yet again, for the Division III New England Championship on the last weekend of the season.

Editor's note: Sophomore Dylan Bloy wrestles in the 126 lb. class for the most-improved team on campus, and his will probably be a familiar face at the Vision Park pasta bar as New England draws closer.

Women finish in now-traditional 3rd at UVM

by Heide Andersen

The women's Nordic ski team wandered into the snowy realms of the Green Mountain State last weekend and brought home yet another third place finish, this one coming in the University of Vermont Carnival. The 5km classic held at Trapp's

Women's skiing

Family Lodge in Stowe on Friday gave many skiers problems as temperatures above freezing led to difficult waxing conditions. Eph freshmen Lindley Hall (who finished in 19:18) and Nikki Kimball (19:34) posted strong top 10 finishes. Kris Hansen '91 notched a 13th-place finish, and was followed by seniors Kristen Froburg and Heide Andersen, who wound up 15th and 16th. Ann Bokman '91 wrapped up the squad's scoring as she placed 31st, and Williams ended the day with an impressive third-place finish, beating out Middlebury to wind up behind UVM and Dartmouth.

By the time the starting gun for Saturday's 15km skating race fired into the crisp Vermont air, the conditions had changed drastically, with temperatures dropping to about zero degrees. The Williams women remained hot on the tracks, however.

After a dogfight in the mass start, teammates Froburg and Hall skied head-to-head all the way to the finish, with Froburg placing an impressive eighth and Hall ending in ninth place, right on Froburg's tail.

Bokman and Andersen also fared well on the challenging course, finishing 12th and 14th. Kimball glided into an 18th-place finish, looking good on the hairy downhill. When the results were tallied,

After a dogfight in the mass start, Froburg and Hall skied head-to-head to the finish.

Williams solidified their tradition of bronze, finishing third in the two-day carnival. This weekend the skiers travel to Dartmouth in preparation for the Williams Winter Carnival on the 16th and 17th.

Hockey travels tonight in hopes of raising mark

by Kevin Greenberg

Tonight the revamped Williams hockey team travels to Babson in an attempt to improve their 5-9-2 record and to right themselves after a 2-2 tie against Amherst Saturday evening left the Ephs shaking their heads.

Making their first road trip for Williams are Mike and Phil Polowski '92, twin transfer students from St. Lawrence University in New York. The twin brothers, from Michigan via Choate Preparatory in Connecticut, joined the Ephs on February 1 and played their first game in Williams uniforms against Amherst.

The Polowski brothers are just the latest in a series of changes that coach Bill Kangas has been making in an attempt to beef up Williams' 1-7-2 ECAC record. The first change that Kangas made was the switching of Tim Hale '91 and Dave

Bakken '92. When Chris Headrick '91 missed a victory over Lake Forest in a Chicago tournament due to an illness, Kangas moved Bakken to left wing. "And it just worked out well," Kangas said. When Headrick returned, Bakken was left at wing and Headrick was put on a line with Bill Hanson '93 and John McCormick '93.

With Rob Abel '91 now as the right wing for the Polowski twins, only one line of five is still in the same form that it was three weeks ago.

A good defense...

But these revamped lines were unable to score in the Amherst game as defensemen Rick Laferriere '91 and Turk Frechette '93 each scored in the second period against the Lord Jeffs.

Laferriere scored first, just 3:36 into the second period, to give the Ephs a 1-0 lead. The defensemen took a pass from center Ron Van Belle '90 at the top of the slot with four seconds left on a Williams power play and fired it past the Amherst goaltender.

"Coach had been hinting around in practice for us to try different things," said Laferriere. "One of them is for the defensemen to step over and shoot." Laferriere did just that and turned the roughing penalty into a goal.

That goal allowed an extremely large and vocal Williams side to chant "Scoreboard! Scoreboard!" at their Defector counterparts across the rink. But the Williams team was stopped with 8:50 remaining in the period when Amherst's Doug Smink scored from in front. Smink was assisted by his brother David Smink and by Dan Nakajima.

But the silence was short, very short. Just 23 seconds later Frechette stole a pass at the Williams blue line and took the puck the length of the ice. Frechette deked the backhand and then pushed the forehand past Amherst goaltender Brian Doyle. Despite starting all year, it was Frechette's first career goal at Williams, and was even sweeter because it came in front of his brother Tim Frechette '89, who was on campus to honor former coach Bill McCormick during Hockey Alumni Weekend.

Celebrating in style

"All I could think of going down the ice was keep skating," said the freshman, who was still leaping around the Williams bench ever a minute after play resumed. "I was more tired from celebrating that than I was from skating down the ice."

But despite a 2-1 lead at the end of the second period, Kangas felt that the first penalty-marred minutes were not good Williams hockey.

"We didn't play that well the first two periods. The crowd was loud and we were all hyped up. We started doing some things that we hadn't done in a while, including chasing around in our zone and taking bad penalties." The Ephs took 11 minutes in penalties in the first period alone.

Sean Seguin '91 agreed with the coach. "We love the big crowds. We just have to learn to handle them better."

Kangas said that the Ephs righted themselves and played "good hockey" in the third period. However, Doug Smink tallied the last goal of the game just 1:07 into the period, while the Lord Jeffs were shorthanded. Just eight seconds into a Williams power play, Smink took a pass from Nakajima and fired at Doyle. Everybody stopped and then one official at the blue line called it a goal. But according to Ford and several other players the puck never entered the net.

"The last goal was not in the net," said the goalie. "It was a good ten inches off I stopped the puck and covered it up. One of the Amherst guys going by even said 'nice save' as he skated away from them that was called a goal."

"To tie that way is very disappointing," said Ford.

"One of our major goals at the beginning of the season was to win Little Three," said Abel. The tie, coupled with an earlier Amherst victory over Wesleyan, will require the Ephs to defeat a strong Wesleyan team on Saturday to salvage a share of the title.

Tough night for Ford

The non-goal was just the last problem of the night for Ford, who missed 7:28 of the first period after getting his leg gashed by an Amherst player. The cut, just above Ford's knee, required seven "very thick" stitches, according to the goalie. With a knee under anesthesia, Ford returned to the game, but as the drug wore off after the game he said it was "very sore. I'll take (practice) day by day, but it won't keep me out (tonight)."

Tonight the Polowski twins will be joining Ford on the ice in another attempt to tally their first Williams points, their first of the year after sitting out three months of hockey after deciding to transfer to St. Lawrence they would have had to sit out the whole season and, if they had chosen a Division I school, it would have cost them a second year. "It was between Williams and Colorado College, which was Division I and we'd have to sit out a year," Phil said. "It was a huge thing to sit out a year and then come back and play."

"And academically, when we got into Williams it answered any questions we had of where we were going," added Mike.

A "package deal?"

The two twins never considered going separately and are even living in adjacent rooms on campus this year. "Even out of high school we were a package deal," said Phil. "We've always been roommates or adjacent singles. We do everything the same, except the chicks."

Not even the "chicks" cannot tell them apart. One member of the boys' hockey team watching their second practice was overheard commenting on their likeness. "They are so much alike they even have identical dimples," she said.

But aside from the dimples, the brothers have another added advantage. "They're really good playing together," said Kangas. "It seems instinctive how they make blind passes to each other."

The twins saw a lot of action in the Amherst game, more than Kangas expected before the contest, and were on the ice for the crucial shifts, both at the end of regulation and of overtime. Kangas said that he expects that heavy ice time will continue tonight, Thursday at home against Amherst, and when the Ephs host Wesleyan Saturday.

Many of the defeats the Williams grapplers suffered were close. Sullivan went down 1-5 in a hard-fought match. Mawn lost a heartbreaking fight to Springfield's Tom Green '93. Coach Caron said, "He was the outstanding wrestler at the tournament."

Freshman Sean Rourke (177) pinned an opponent from Lowell in 22 seconds and was undefeated until Caron pulled him out. The coach was wary of Rourke hurting an already injured shoulder, especially with New England on the horizon.

Dylan Bloy '92 (126) wrestled some of the toughest entries in his weight class, eventually finishing 2-2. He lost 8-7 to the number one seed from Worcester Polytech and lost to the eventual third-place finisher in his class.

The tournament marked the return of sophomore Ivan Fermon (126), who had traveled to the Soviet Union over Winter Study. He managed to get a win even though he was out of shape.

Hot wrestlers post three wins, drop home match to powerful Springfield

The Williams wrestlers came in a respectable seventh out of thirteen competitive teams at the Plymouth State Invitational on January 14 in a meet that also included some Division I and II schools. The undefeated finish followed on the heels of a home loss to Springfield and impressive victories over Trinity, Skidmore, and Oneonta.

The team was tough under fire. Freshman Bill Sullivan (118 pounds), ranked second in his weight class, lost a close one to the eventual champion but ended the tourney with a record of 3-1.

Sophomore Jim Mawn (158) had an excellent tournament, according to coach Roger Caron. He beat the third- and fourth-ranked seeds in his weight class on his way to a 4-1 record in the tourney and averaged his loss in the previous team match.

Strong weekend gives team winning record

by Allison Meade

The Williams women's squash team ended the month of January with a bang last weekend at the inaugural Williams Invitational, thereby setting the stage for a strong ending to what has been a somewhat disappointing season.

The varsity squad entered the tournament at a pivotal point in their season, sporting a 4-3 record after a road win against Vassar on Tuesday. And the Ephs lost no time in making sure that they pivoted in the direction of the win column, winning five matches in three days and doing so in a completely dominant manner.

The first victim was a rather weak Haverford team, which was easily overwhelmed 9-0 by the Williams women.

"They have a different mentality," Caron said of the Springfield team.

"It's like comparing apples and oranges," he noted. Springfield's physical prowess and said of his team, "We have to get physically stronger."

On January 27, the team wrestled Trinity and Skidmore at Trinity.

Led by senior captain Susie Piper and first seed Lisa Brayton '91, the Williams nine did not give up a single game. On the second day of the tournament, the first victim was Colgate, and the match was almost as lopsided. Williams crushed the Colgate squad 9-0 and dropped only three games in the process.

In the second match of the day, Williams played Vassar in what proved to be a repeat performance of a match played between the two teams less than a week before. As in the previous outing, Williams won 8-1, with second-seeded Piper suffering the only loss to Vassar's Stacy LeBaron.

In spite of the lopsided final score, the match was not without its share of excitement. Brayton and tenth-seeded Abigail Lash '92 had to battle through five games to their victories and third seed Jen Thurman '93, seventh seed Amanda Crane '91, and ninth seed Holly Hedeeman '92 were pushed to four games.

The second half of the tournament proceeded in much the same fashion. The Williams team played "consistent and persistent squash," according to coach Gail Ramsay, and thoroughly bullied their opponents.

In their fourth and toughest match of the tournament, the Ephs thrashed Bowdoin 7-2. Brayton lost 0-3 in the first position and fifth seed Miriam Marcus '91, fell in four games.

But sixth seed Kristina Forbes '92, and eighth seed senior Kristine Ohly managed to pull off wins in their five game matches. Forbes won 15-7, 17-14, 15-8, 12-15, 15-9, while Ohly finally came away with a squeaker, 15-11, 17-18, 15-7, 15-18, 17-16 in one of the hardest-fought matches of the season.

On Sunday, the last day of the tourney, it was Cornell's turn to fall prey in the Ephs' sharp play. Williams came away from that meeting with its fifth win of the weekend, beating the Big Red 8-1.

Other victors on the day were Sticky Benson '90, 1000 free, Dan Snyder '90, 200 free, Andrew Kirkpatrick '93, 500 free, Scott Schwager '91 on both boards and Greg Jordan '92 in the 300 free.

Although "A win is a win," to paraphrase a great sage, the Ephs clearly have to focus in the near future to prepare for what may be a tough New England competition.

Close meet for women

The women entered the pool prepared for a challenge. The Maroon women were a tough Division II squad, and were more than prepared to give the Ephwomen a dose of their own aquatic medicine.

Still wondering what a Maroon was, the women came out scrapping. A rare touch-out loss in the opening relay and an incredible 10:35 three-minute freestyle victory by Maroon Brenda Bradley caused some nail biting at the start.

The women then traded victories in the next four events, with Springfield getting the better pointswise, Lee Schroeder '91 and Lesley Nye '93 one-twoed the 200 free and Ulla Pitha '93 won the 100 breast. Congratulations go out to Liz Eberhart '92, who qualified for a return trip to nationals with a second-place time of 2:14.17 in the 200 fly.

With the lead evaporating, the women had a three-event rally, with Schroeder and Abby Marns '93 winning the 50 free, Nye sweeping the 100 free and a meter diving sweep by Kristina Vandevonne '91, Patty Albright '92 and Ash Clary '91.

With two late victories in the 200 breast by (who else?) Pitha and a 3 meter diving sweep, the two teams entered the final relay in a winner-take-all situation. When the smoke cleared, Marns, Lebaron, Eberhart and Schroeder won the race and the fans of the crowd in a thrilling victory.

The teams now enter the dreaded part of the season known as "the Ban." This period, which sees the swimmers free of the rigors of all sports, helps the teams purge their systems of any residue chemicals and lactic acid thoughts so they can focus clearly upon their New England meets.

The next meet is against Div I Colgate at home on Saturday in their final home dual meet.

Major moved into second place on the Williams all-time scoring list, passing coach Harry Sheehy '75, who racked up 1449 points in only three seasons of varsity play. Major now has 1476 career points, which leaves him 150 points shy of Tim Walsh '86, the leading scorer in Williams history.

The Middlebury Panthers came into Chandler on January 23 and were unhappy witnesses to another edition of the Garcia Major show. The captain registered 14 points and five assists in the first half of his way to a 24-point effort on 10 of 22 shooting from the field.

Williams held a commanding 38-26 lead at the half, shooting 58 percent from the field in the first half as a team. The Panthers cut the lead to four early in the second half, but Major buried a pair of three-pointers to pad the Eph advantage. Healy pitched in with a pair of big hugs from the inside in the later stages, the second one giving the Ephmen a 56-51 lead with under five minutes to play.

Powerful track team packs suitcases and tours New England

by Josh Brumberg

Perhaps sensing the advent of spring semester, the track team dusted off their luggage two weeks ago and embarked on a tour of New England that saw them accumulate nearly as many ribbons as miles traveled.

On January 27th, the Ephwomen traveled along the Mohawk Trail to compete against ten other teams in Northampton. While the women were cruising to a sparkling second-place finish, the male runners were facing their toughest competition this year in a tri meet at MIT. On that Sunday, the men and women competed in the TAC meet held at Harvard. Finally, this past weekend the runners returned home to the familiar confines of Towne Field House.

At Smith College the women's team was led by senior co-captain Susan Gray, who won the 800m with a time of 2:18.9. Other highlights included junior Anne Platt's second place finish in the 1500m.

The Williams runners came to gether in the relays to finish strongly. In the 4x200, the team of Kim Shields '91, Allison Smith '90, Allison Orsi '93 and Karen Morrissey '93 posted a second-place finish. Meanwhile, Morrissey, Gray, Lee Kiechel '93 and Cherie Macauley '92 teamed up to finish first in the mile relay, thereby joining their counterparts in the two mile relay (Jennifer Rancy '93, Susan Donna '92, Deborah Murphy '93 and Hilary Cairns '92) in the winner's circle.

Man visit Beantown

While the women were running at Smith, the men were resting after a night of tough competition at MIT. Highlights included the second-place finishes of Bradford Behr '92 in the high jump, Carey Simon '90 in the 400m and Jeff Cooper '93 in the 800m. The dashing trio of John Walker '90, Jonathan Lindley '92 and Jeff Igharo '90 qualified for the finals in the 55m dash, with Walker and Igharo winding up in second and third.

On Sunday the two teams reunited to compete on the unfamiliar banked track at Harvard. Notable results included Igharo placing fifth in the triple jump and, along with Lindley, qualifying for the semifinals in the 55 dash. On the women's side of the track, Orsi led the way as she qualified for the finals in the 55 high hurdles.

After straining the odometer on the team van, the Williams runners stayed home this past weekend. Saturday's meet could only be described as a success, as Williams runners notched strong finishes in almost all the events. The home crowd was indeed a help for the Williams runners, as Macauley noted that she was happy with "a good show of support."

Home sweet home

The women responded to the familiar environs in fine fashion, as they proved that they are the team to beat in the region by winning Saturday's meet decisively. According to coach Peter Farwell, "the women dominated except for the weights." Coach David Sheppard was happy with the win and pointed to it as an "indication of the team's strength."

The Williams women crossed the finish line first in eight of the ten track events. The strong sprint corps was a key to Williams's victory, as Smith courageously ran and won the 400m with a stress fracture in her foot. When asked afterwards about her result, she exclaimed that she was "pretty thrilled."

Ann Dannhauer '90 won the 300m by holding off a late charge by freshman Helene Wilburn. Macauley led a sweep of the top three places in the 1500. Orsi showed her diversity by winning both the 55 high hurdles and the triple jump. Donna led another Williams sweep of the top three places in the 600yd run. Shields won the 200m and placed second in the 55 dash. "I felt pretty good in

Cagers sink Cardinals in wild contest

by Asli Bali

You could almost feel the tension in the air of Chandler gym on Saturday afternoon as the women's basketball squad faced off against Wesleyan in a heated showdown. After one of the more memorable finishes in the history of the young gym, the Ephwomen walked away with a wild 58-57 victory.

Wesleyan opened the first half by getting on the scoreboard ahead of Williams, but that was one of the few leads the Cardinals were able to enjoy. The Ephwomen responded quickly to the first Wesleyan bucket, and the first ten minutes of the half remained a tug of war for the lead. Williams worked its offensive set and succeeded a passing game for their points, while the Cardinals capitalized on breakaway opportunities with easy lay-ups, and crashed the boards on the other shots they took.

An inside look: 2 weeks in the life of a wrestler

by Dylan Bloy

Thursday, January 25, 2:30 p.m.

Perhaps the greatest moment in the history of wrestling at Williams College occurred last night, as we beat SUNY Oneonta 22-20 in Oneonta. Oneonta shut us out 41-0 last year, and was ranked nineteenth in the nation in Division III entering last night's match.

Wrestling was the losingest program at Williams last decade, but coaches Roger Caron and Scott Lewis have turned the team around in their brief two-and-a-half year tenure here. After turning in a 3-12 season two years ago, Williams wrestling was 6-7 last year. This season, in spite of a tougher schedule that includes several national powerhouses, we are currently 6-2, with wins over Plymouth State, M.I.T., and Oneonta. We should finish the season with at least 11 wins, including our first Little Three title in over 20 years.

Yesterday we left for our match at 3:30 and returned at 1:00 in the morning. I have practice in about an hour, and I'll probably have to lose seven or eight pounds before weigh-in tomorrow evening for our match at Trinity on Saturday.

A handy device known as a plastic suit will help me do this. It's a light plastic garment which effectively turns your body into a furnace, sweating out extra pounds of water so that we can all make weight.

If you're wondering why we all don't just wrestle at our natural weights, you're probably not alone. But reaching an agreement to prevent weight gain from cutting weight would be as thorny a problem as nuclear disarmament, without the possible global benefits as incentive.

Friday, January 26, 10:00 p.m.

On the eve of the Trinity match everybody has made weight, and are now undoubtedly chowing down with complex carbohydrates (a.k.a. pizza) in preparation for tomorrow's match. This will put most of us several pounds over the weight which we made today.

Today was a weight practice, which consists of very little formal practice. Most wrestlers (except for those who don't have to worry about weight, like our heavyweight Andy Allen '91) come in early to see how much they are over, and then plan a workout before practice accordingly.

It was fairly close to weight after practice yesterday and had only a bowl of cereal for dinner, so I only had a few pounds to lose today. So I came in about 30 minutes before practice, strapped on my rubber suit, and hopped on the Sistrmaster at maximum for 15 minutes.

We weighed in at about quarter to five, and then bided our time until dinner at Mission, featuring the infamous pasta line. Incidentally, Coach Caron said today that if we had beaten Norwich, who beat us by only one point, we probably would be nationally ranked in Division III. And if we could beat Rhode Island College...

Tomorrow's match should be an easy one. Trinity is a pretty bad team and I predict a shutout against them. The other match of the day is against Skidmore, a squad which we know very little about, but one which could be even worse than Trinity. The mechanics of the match are as follows: since three squads are involved, the home team, Trinity, selects the order of the matches.

They will probably wrestle Skidmore first, have us wrestle Skidmore second, and wrestle us last. This will give us a chance to see Skidmore's line-up before we wrestle them. If they're as bad as we suspect, Coach plans to wrestle our entire second team against them.

Saturday, January 27, 9:00 p.m.

We beat Skidmore 47-6 and Trinity 51-

by Jeff Merritt

The Wesleyan Cardinals came into Chandler Athletic Center on Saturday night sporting an unimpressive 5-9 record, but they were able to dictate the flow of the game and held the lead almost the entire way. Only a baseline jumper from captain Garcia Major '90 in the final seconds pushed the Ephs out to a 48-46 advantage and sent the visitors back to Middletown with a sour taste in their mouths.

This victory, combined with a split of a road trip in Maine and an eight-point triumph at home over the Middlebury

Men's Hoops

Panthers, leaves Williams with a 12-3 season mark and a leg up in the race for the Little Three title.

Slow pace cripples Ephs

The Cardinals featured a slow and deliberate half-court offense for the entire 40 minutes, which had the desired effect of slowing down the flow of the game and suffocating the Williams offense. The Ephmen seemed lethargic at times, unable to run the floor or quicken the pace, and they shot just less than 40 percent from the field on the night. The smaller Wesleyan squad also outbounded the Ephs by a margin of 37-27 on the game, grabbing 13 offensive boards to 11 for Williams.

The first half was a definite sign of things to come, as the Cardinals slowed down the pace and clung to a slim lead, only to see the Ephmen claim the advantage in the final seconds. Sophomore Sherman Jones' jumper from the top of the key gave Williams its first lead at 25-24 with two ticks remaining before halftime.

Than Healy '91 led the Ephs with 10 points and three offensive rebounds in the first half, while Jones pitched in with six points. Junior center Jerry Keish had nine points and eight rebounds for the Cardinals.

The Ephmen held a 30-28 advantage early in the second half, but their offense promptly fell asleep and Wesleyan outscored them by a 14-2 margin over the next nine minutes. Williams trailed by 10 points with eight minutes remaining, and the Cardinals seemed on their way to an upset.

Back from the dead

A 10-foot jumper from Jones brought Williams out of its slumber, and then Rich Williams '90 buried a three-pointer. Major drove the length of the floor to score on a dazzling lay-up, cutting the deficit to 42-39.

Major next buried a 15-footer with 3:05 remaining to cut the Wesleyan lead to 45-44, and then both offenses ran into a stone wall. The Cards sank a free throw at the 2:08 mark to build their lead to two, and on the ensuing Williams possession Major lofted up a shot that was off the mark. Wesleyan grabbed the rebound but turned the ball over, and Jones scored on an uncontested lay-up to tie the game at 46-46.

Wesleyan missed a jump shot with 1:03 remaining, and then a John Conte '92 three-point attempt was off the mark for Williams. The Cardinals took possession with 40 seconds remaining and the shot clock turned off. They successfully ran some time off the clock, but the intense Williams defense forced a loose ball near halfcourt. Wesleyan recovered but were caught on a backcourt violation, turning the ball over to Williams with nine seconds remaining.

The Ephmen set up a final play to go to their reliable captain, and Major responded, burying a jumper in traffic with two ticks remaining on the clock. The Wesleyan inbound pass sailed way out of reach, ending the game and raising the Williams record in Little Three action to 2-0 on the season.

Coach Harry Sheehy admitted that his squad had dodged a bullet, and he gave a lot of credit to the Cardinals for a superb effort. "Their slowdown tactics really softened us at the offensive end," he said, "because we knew that if we shot

Today, losing only one match on a fluke pin against Skidmore. Although Trinity made us wrestle Skidmore first, before we had a chance to see them, Coach Caron lived up to his word by putting in our second line-up, which cleaned up against the club team. Then we sat through a barnburner between Trinity and Skidmore which reminded me of high school wrestling. Trinity won in the final match, when their 190-pounder pinned Skidmore's heavyweight.

Finally, we got our chance to take on

Trinity, and we absolutely crushed them, winning all seven matches, four by pin, and benefitting from three forfeits. "Did we used to be like this?" freshman Sean Rourke asked at one point during the match, indicating the weakness of the Bantam squad. The answer, supplied by the two survivors from that era of Williams wrestling, was a definite yes. The victories lifted our record to 8-2, tying a school record for wins and assuring ourselves of our first winning season since 1976.

Our next match, at home against nationally ranked Division II powerhouse Springfield, is not until next Thursday, so Coach gave us two days off. However, when we return on Tuesday afternoon, we will face the now legendary Megapracice, which Coach has been hyping as a four-hour marathon including running, lifting, wrestling, and conditioning.

"No one will have problems making weight after Megapracice," brags the Coach. Early odds are that he'll either get bored before the four hours are up, or he'll run out of ideas for torturing us.

Tuesday, January 30, 10:00 p.m.

Today was Megapracice, which nearly lived up to its advance billing. We wrestled for about two hours, then lifted for 45 minutes, and finished with half an hour of conditioning. It didn't seem too much longer than a normal practice, but some of us were tiring noticeably towards the

Four students charged at Prospect party

by Tom Dupree

The four officers of Prospect House were charged early Saturday morning with furnishing alcohol to minors following an investigation by Williamstown Police of a party early Saturday morning. The students charged are President Jody Weisberg '92, Vice President Jared Cummings '92, Treasurer Peter Schneberger '92 and Secretary Phil Harris '90.

According to Williamstown Police officer Peter Mosher, the investigation was prompted by a series of incidents near Prospect House in the early morning hours.

Shortly after midnight, Mosher said, Williamstown Police officers discovered an apparently intoxicated teenage male on North Street. "He was just rolled up in a ball on the road. He told us he had come from a party at Prospect House," Mosher said, adding that the youth was not a Williams student and was obviously underage.

Mosher said that several minutes later he and his partner, Officer Kevin Gerner, encountered a group of teenagers running on Route 2. "They were headed towards the Williams Inn, where their car was parked. They were just running and hollering down the road. When asked, they said they had come from Prospect House," Mosher said.

Officers approached by student. According to the Williamstown police log, at 1:17 a.m. the officers were approached on Route 2 by a Williams student who reported a leather jacket stolen several minutes before from the party at Prospect House.

Based on all of this information, the Williamstown officers, accompanied by a Williams Security officer, entered Prospect House at approximately 1:30 a.m., Mosher said. Although the late night party in the basement had ended shortly after one, several students were lingering in the room.

Mosher said that the officers observed one student, whom they presumed to be underage, finishing a cup of beer. They asked the student to provide identification, and, when he could not, asked him if he was a minor. The student, a Williams freshman who spoke to the Record only on condition of anonymity, admitted he was 19. At this point, the officers recorded the student's name and residence.

"It seemed they were just looking to bust someone. I finished my beer, then was about ten feet from the door, on my way out, when they stopped me. They asked for ID and got my name. They asked if I had anything to do with serving the alcohol. I said I didn't, that I had just played in the band [All Scrunched Up]," the student said.

"After awhile they said I was free to go, but they might contact me in the next few days," the student said. "I was astounded by what they did."

"The student was stopped because he poured beer down his throat," Mosher said. "He was underage. Other people had been [at the party] and left who were also underage." Mosher said he did not believe any charges would be filed against the student.

Time changes proposed in class schedule

by Chris Lawrence

Last week, as the second semester ground slowly into gear, members of the Calendar and Scheduling Committee gathered in Brooks Rogers for an open meeting with the student body to discuss proposed changes in the schedule.

The committee, composed of students and members of the faculty and assisted by Dean of the College Stephen Fix and Registrar Charles Toomajian, had been, according to an all-campus memo, "asked to see whether some changes in the schedule could increase student choice and reduce conflicts in choosing courses next year."

Professor of Music and committee chairman Douglas Moore opened the discussion. He introduced the two proposed alternative schedules, and emmerated the advantages and liabilities of these two possibilities, as well as of the current schedule.

The alternative schedules both call for an 8:30 A.M. opening class period. Presumably, the change will make the period more palatable to both students and faculty who had been reluctant to take the early morning slot, which currently begins at 8:00. The resulting distribution of class meetings should serve to widen opportunities.

Both schedules manage to maintain the end of the class day at 3:45 while they provide for three once-a-week seminar meetings. Moreover, both schedules contain a variety of twice-weekly meetings. For students, this would continue to provide a broad range of opportunities for the pacing of the class week.

Yet there are disadvantages as well, namely a severe limitation of lunch time for many students. With scheduling options severely circumscribed by athletic and lab requirements, it is lunch which will stand to suffer under a new schedule, the discussion seemed to indicate.

Expendable lunch?

"It turns out many students don't eat breakfast; many do eat lunch," Toomajian said. Many still seemed to feel that lunch remained the most expendable element of the student's day. It was also felt that Dining Services would be in a position to provide box lunches for those with minimal breaks.

Proposed changes aside, Moore continued to emphasize that the cornerstone of the committee's work would continue to be enforcement of the rules which govern departmental distribution of class meetings. While this measure alone seemed to make retention of the old schedule a viable move, some members disagreed.

"That decision would be nutty because students' choices are so greatly reduced," Fix said.

Committee members said they were disturbed by the lack of attendance at the hearing. Brooks Rogers was "virtually empty, with a mere half-a-dozen students coming to offer feedback and contribute ideas."

The showing led all present to speculate on whether or not scheduling is truly a matter of general concern at Williams. Evan Moore '92 suggested that which ever course the committee pursued, it would inevitably be criticized by the same people who had elected not to attend. "That's just how a highly apathetic student body works," Moore said.

Panel covers politics, issues facing blacks

by Tom Dupree

Scholars and professors from across the country converged on Williams last week to participate in a conference on politics and the black community. The conference, which began Thursday and ended Saturday, consisted of five two-hour panels covering issues ranging from electoral studies to gender concerns and the political significance of rap music. From one to three papers were presented at each panel, followed by a general discussion and question and answer period.

Associate Dean of the College Preston Smith and Assistant Professor of Political Science Stuart Clarke were the main organizers of the event, which was held in Lawrence Hall and Bronfman Auditorium.

"[The purpose of the conference was to] bring together people who have different perspectives in order to exchange ideas," Smith said. "We're thinking about how we analyze black politics and what's the most effective way to do so. We were concerned that not enough of this exchange is going on."

Both Smith and Clarke noted that as the conference began, two distinct perspectives on the issues became evident. "The way in which the conference evolved is constituted by an interesting juxtaposition, involving on one hand an understanding of politics driven by a focus on traditional institutions, traditional political parties, the judiciary and traditional modes of political behavior," Clarke said.

Politics through culture. "On the other hand, some panels tried to focus the way politics takes place through behavior that isn't seen as political, behavior that might be seen as cultural," he continued. "[These panels] locate sites of cultural practice, and see how we can interpret them as political behavior. It's not unusual or surprising that this is what developed."

"There are two generations of scholars involved in the conference: the 'old guard' and the 'young guard.' That generational difference drives a lot of what's going on."

Smith said that any such difference in attitudes could only have helped the conference. "There is a healthy sort of resistance. What comes out is a stronger sense of what we mean by politics and political thought," he said. "This is a desired result. It provides a working definition of what politics is, a richer notion, one that is more flexible."

"It's something we might consider doing next year, since we'll know how to do something like this much better by then. We just might see something in the future," Smith said, though he emphasized that there are no concrete plans for the conference to become a regular event.

The conference was sponsored by the Office of the Dean of the Faculty, Afro-American Studies, the political science, sociology, and history departments, the Multicultural Center, and the Black Student Union.

Tbilisi Winter Study students show projects

by Dan Silverman

Williams students and faculty who participated in the Williams-Tbilisi Exchange program gave a presentation Tuesday in which they discussed their experiences during the third Winter Study trip to the Soviet Union. Students also presented the findings of their various projects concerning life in the Soviet Union, with particular emphasis on Soviet Georgia.

Assistant Professor of Linguistics Don Singleton led the Williams group, which also included Assistant Professor of Sociology Philip Kasinitz, Visiting Associate Professor of Environmental Studies Shanna Halpern and 17 students. The program consisted of a three-week tour of the Soviet Union. The group spent two days in both Leningrad and Moscow and the remainder of the trip in the republic of Georgia.

Singleton began Tuesday's presentation with a synopsis of the political events which took place in Georgia and other nearby Soviet republics during the time the Williams group was there. He mentioned major uprisings resulting in government crackdowns in the republic of Azerbaijan, strikes by Georgian transportation workers and a protest in Tbilisi by a group of ethnic women from a small region inside of Georgia who were upset about their own people's separatist movement.

"There were discussions and protests concerning whether Georgian men should serve in what Georgians call 'the Occupying Army' [the Soviet Army]," Singleton said.

Georgian independence movement. Singleton's introduction was followed by the presentation of the history and present condition of the Georgian independence movement, the subject of a study project by Peter Crawford '91, David Moore '92 and Maria Quintos '91.

Crawford said that Georgia has nearly always been a captive nation controlled by the Russians or the Ottoman Turks. Nationalist feelings and actions, however, began in earnest with the death of Stalin and have continued with the most recent protest in April of 1989. That protest resulted in the calling in of Soviet troops and the death of several Georgian protesters.

Moore and Quintos discussed the ambivalence of Georgians in their desire for independence. They said this ambivalence stems from the small republic's inability to support itself economically without Russian or Western help. Georgia has no functioning locally-directed government.

Therefore, many Georgians think there would be a genuine threat of invasion by their Muslim neighbors to the south, Turkey and Iran, if the small Christian nation were made independent; Moore and Quintos said. The Soviet government also has qualms about granting Georgia independence.

"The Soviets won't grant Georgian independence for fear of having then to grant independence to all the other Soviet Republics," Quintos said.

Effects of massacre

A second presentation by sophomores Andrew Everett, Daniel Kunin and Matthew Wheelock addressed the Georgian demonstration and massacre on April 9, 1989 and the effects those events had on the Georgian people.

These Williams students played an audio recording of interviews they had with two Georgian students who had participated in the demonstration and who were both injured by Soviet soldiers armed with poisoned gas and sharpened shovels.

Check IDs at college parties

Local high students are not an uncommon sight at campus parties. It has become increasingly clear, however, that they come not to socialize, but to drink -- often heavily. The events surrounding last Friday's party at Prospect House symbolize just how far out of control this situation has gotten.

After discovering a number of intoxicated high-schoolers in the area, one of whom had curled up for a snooze on North Street, Williamstown police entered Prospect to investigate. They subsequently charged four house officers with providing alcohol to minors.

It is unfortunate that the officers must be held legally responsible for Friday's events. Quite possibly they did not realize high-schoolers were at the party. The difference in appearance between 17- and 20-year-olds is not particularly great, especially in a dark basement at 1:00 a.m.

Nevertheless, there is no arguing the fact that the house officers were negligent in their duties. College party plans include a question asking how officers will keep the party closed to non-Williams students. The standard response is "Check for college ID," but that is a measure rarely if ever carried out.

Williams College has a very friendly relationship with town police. Chief Mike Kennedy has made it clear that he does not wish to act as a college security force. The police permit tailgate parties at Weston Field, allow the college to enforce its own drinking regulations, and generally leave students alone.

Now all this is threatened. If it starts to grow evident that college students and officials cannot regulate their own events, why shouldn't the police assume that responsibility? And while they're at it, what would stop them from cracking down on drinking by underage college students? That is a measure that could have drastic consequences for everyone at the college.

The police have sent us a much-needed message that their salutary neglect of drinking regulations for college students does not extend to high-schoolers. House officers will be held legally responsible if they fail to check for college identification. They should be.

After all, it is not a difficult measure to station one person at each entrance to a party to perform a two-second check. At many parties, someone already checks for invitations, so why not ask to see an ID as well? Students manage to remember their IDs when eating at the dining halls, so they would surely have no problem bringing them along to parties.

From now on, there should be no excuses. We have seen the problem, we know the law and we can no longer doubt the consequences. Winter Carnival is this weekend. All over campus, students will be asked to present invitations to enter parties. This year, let's ask for IDs as well.

REAGAN'S DIARY

Letters

Racism arises at Chet's Barber Shop

To the editor:

Having lived in racially integrated communities for most of my adult life, I am unaccustomed to the idea of barbers' not knowing or wanting to cut Black people's hair. White barbers in Cambridge and Hyde Park have cut my hair without hesitation, asking, when they thought necessary, how to re-shape or correct. As a newcomer to the Williamstown community, I heard something new from a local barber -- that "way and curly hair is one thing, but kinky hair is another!"

Last Thursday Chet told me, "It takes twice as long to do their hair as regular hair." In the middle of my haircut, he told me that he did not want to cut Black people's hair and did not want to learn. The colored got their own shops down in Florida," he added. In case his message was not yet clear, he thought he could reinforce it by yanking my hair and pushing my head abruptly.

Chet complained that barbing does not pay enough; that's why the barbers' shop has closed. The hours are long, and the retirement and health benefits are poor; that's why he has no patience for "kinky hair." I think I was patient with Chet. I am sympathetic to his apprehensions as he approaches retirement and to his apparent professional insecurity. I do not, however, feel that either matter warrants his rudeness to me.

Chet says that he had to cut Black people's hair in the armed forces and that now says he gets "maybe two or three colored a year," by which I assume he means Black customers. Chet has learned enough over the years to do a fine job on my hair, which he did despite his efforts to humiliate me. Moreover, it took him no longer than to satisfy either of the customers who preceded me.

It is not without ambivalence that I raise somehow so petty an issue before so large an audience. However, among neighbors, willful unkindness and lack of professionalism cannot remain private matters. I wish to advise the college and the Williamstown community that Chet's Barber Shop does not welcome Black customers.

Food Service workers need consideration

To the editor:

Have you ever bet on someone at dinner, lost, and so had to flume someone else's tray for them? You didn't like it, did you? Well, I work at Baxter and I had to flume 28 trays today, along with other assorted junk left on tables. It took me 30 minutes. I didn't like it.

Let's look at two reasons why people leave their trays on the table, or any other place (including those big metal carts with lots of racks), and see why they won't work.

"I have a class at one!" (Also known as the "I have a meeting at seven" syndrome during dinner time.) Sorry, but, to be blunt, that's not my problem. If you need to make it to class or a meeting on time, then flume earlier. For a college population that's supposed to be so smart, it's truly amazing how hard it is for some of its members to figure this out. It's not fair to make me flume your trays because you're late. You've been told since your first day here that you are expected to flume your own trays, and you should have been able to notice by now that there is always a flume line at 1:00. You should, therefore, be able to figure out that you will have to flume earlier.

While this has never actually been said in English to me, it has been said very loudly in Body English: "I'm not supposed to worry about fluming my tray because you're supposed to pick up after me." WRONG. I am not paid to be your servant. You are expected to act maturely by now, and part of that is cleaning up after yourself. That lesson has been hammered at you since kindergarten! If you haven't learned it by now, I wonder if you should truly be here.

And while we're on the subject... Don't come in late. This is common sense. No restaurant would let you in late; why should Baxter? And also, don't go through closed doors. They're closed for a reason. If you want your food, get it before the line closes. Line hours are published at the beginning of every year and are always available at the dining halls.

All that we're asking for is a little bit of courtesy. Not much, I think. Sure, maybe you have to stand in line for a few minutes (usually not more than five, even with the longest flume lines), or plan to come in on time, or take a few more seconds to not make a mess, but that's not too much to ask, is it? We work hard to try to make eating at Baxter and the other dining halls somewhat nice, so please, give us a break.

Display case violence was repulsive

To whomever broke the BGLC display case:

Thank you. Your anonymous and idiotic violence against the display case achieved more than just its intended vandalism. As a homophobe, you have made yourself materially present, you have displayed yourself in a way that rarely happens on this campus. In a moment of rage, you embodied your repulsive ignorance, in fact, you became nothing more than Repulsive Ignorance. Reduced to such by the unsigned bit of work you left in Baxter, you exist as a symbol alone. You are now an example and nothing else, but not even an original symbol: the display case has been broken twice in the last two years.

Rather than the insidious, quiet homophobia that usually infuses the atmosphere of this campus, now one can point to the cesspool of beliefs represented by your action. You have made homophobia more manageable. You have inadvertently opened up a discourse which will inevitably call attention to invisible, and dangerously ubiquitous, silent bigotry. Because there is no way to approach it, to attack it, or to deal with it, this silent homophobia succeeds famously at Williams. You, however, have embodied this heretofore hard-to-expose bigotry and now we can point to it, define it. Moreover, your beliefs are now expressed and associated with all the eloquence of hit-and-run cowardliness and vandalism.

OPINIONS

Teaching isn't always as easy as it looks

by Mary Moule

It seemed innocuous enough when it arrived in my mailbox. A notice from the Dean's Office offering juniors and seniors a chance to experience Winter Study from a teacher's point of view.

At first, it sounded like a good idea. I thought about the opportunity to be involved in the planning stages instead of the receiving end of a course at Williams. I considered the possibility of working with some of my favorite teachers. I contemplated the prospect of meeting more members of the class of 1993 and getting to work with them for a month.

But then I thought about the increased work load presented by the freshman courses and wondered what my other responsibilities would be. And what if they wanted me to lead a discussion or give a lecture? I fondly remembered how easy Winter Study had been last year, and I recycled the notice with the rest of my mail.

But when I tried to remember what I'd signed up to take months before, I found that I was no longer excited about it. Then it occurred to me that this TA business might be the way out of writing a final paper.

So I filled out the application and told them how much I would like to plan a course, work with my professors and meet freshmen.

"Why not?" I asked a friend after the selections had been made. "Remember how bored I was last January? I didn't drink, I didn't go out, I didn't ski, I didn't have any passionate romances, and I certainly didn't do any work. This year is going to be different. I'm going to be a TA."

I managed to miss the final planning meeting to which the TAs had been invited. So much for planning a course. All I knew was the name of the course and the readings we would examine. I spent my Christmas Break wondering what we would talk about in FRSE 001: Ethnicity and Identity in America.

So it happened that my first contact with the professors and their plans was on the first day of classes. At 9:00 Wednesday morning, the five professors (from five different departments) and their four TAs met to decide what the first class would be about. They had just discovered that the movie planned for that class could not be shown in the room we had been given. But not to worry, we still had 45 minutes before class started. In those 45 minutes the nine of us discussed general ideas about how to stimulate the best discussions, compose possible paper topics, and present the first, rather lengthy reading. We also debated what to do for this first class.

The professors had previously decided that each class would begin with a lecture to the entire class, then we would split into our discussion groups to talk about the reading and the lecture.

The first day's discussion would be have known better.) I found myself replying in the affirmative and felt the glare of the other TAs. What had I done? As the students started amassing in Chemistry 21, I sincerely regretted my foolishness. Fortunately, that plan was scrapped as being unnecessary and not particularly useful minutes before class started, and one of the professors agreed to lecture instead.

A nagging concern mingled with my sense of relief as I marvelled at the sheer number of students. What was the processor would open up the discussion with a few leading questions, some brave soul would answer, and if everything went as planned, we'd have a heated discussion. During long pauses, I would try to answer the question or present one of my own. In fact, the hardest part was sitting as far away as possible from the teacher, as that seemed to be every other student's goal.

But that all changed one day as we met before class, when the professor asked if I'd like to lead a discussion myself. He pointed out that the next two readings both used a more literary approach, and since his field was history while mine was English, maybe I would have some special insights. I almost choked on my cup of tea as the idea of my knowing more about anything than he with his years of experience.

But I was, after all, a teaching assistant, and I hadn't been doing much of either. So I agreed to prepare our two essays by James Baldwin and he promised to help out if I ran into problems.

I was nervous, but I liked the essays and I had a few ideas that I wanted to discuss. I opened up with some observations about the piece and what I'd thought of a particular issue it had raised, then I asked for the students' opinions. When I felt as if I'd ridden my bike into a brick wall. There was a moment of awesome silence and blank faces, and I could feel myself slowly slipping under the table.

Someone finally responded, and the discussion took off. I tried to guide it past the issues I had wanted to address and started to relax. The professor eventually joined in and by the time I ran out of questions, he was comfortably leading the rest of the discussion. As he told me later, when you're paid to talk, sometimes it's hard to stop talking and let someone else lead. I'd mind too much.

For the next class, I went back to being the TA, and he took complete responsibility as the teacher. It was a lot easier, but I realized that my role in the classroom would never be the same. For once, I really had experienced what it was like to be the teacher, and never again would I be able to avert my eyes during those long silences without feeling guilty. From now on, the same sense of duty that forced me through David Copperfield so many years ago will spur me to respond in class.

fessor going to talk about? He said something to me about how any good teacher could get up and lecture at the drop of a hat, and I sunk further into my seat. Maybe this teaching business wasn't for me after all.

I was also still confused about my role in this course. Surely no one expected me to present a spontaneous lecture. So what did they want? I got some advice from the professor that I would be working with as we walked from lecture to discussion.

He told me about how our differences in age, gender, and race would give us more opportunities to play off of each other. "The students will see that we don't necessarily see things the same way," he said. "Don't be afraid to contradict me, be sure to speak up if you have something you want to say, and whatever you do, don't sit next to me."

In the ensuing days, it was actually

A nine-minute remedy

by John (Spud) Freedman

Last Friday I went into the Williamstown Municipal Building and became politically active. Leaving from Baxter Hall, it took me exactly nine minutes to transfer my voter registration from Baltimore to Williamstown, and in so doing my ability to induce political and social change increased ten-fold. At home, every political action I took was ineffective because I was an individual fighting alone against huge, organized lobbying forces. Registering to vote where you go to school makes you more politically active and effective through a student union of voters, raising every student's political voice through solidarity.

Students have had no effective political voice in our society since 1971 when the 26th Amendment guaranteed the franchise to every U.S. citizen over the age of 18. The 26th Amendment was designed to circumvent a threatened student revolution in the late sixties by including students in the political process. Twenty years after the amendment was ratified, however, student enfranchisement has not translated into student empowerment. The problem is not just student registration -- the student population is registered to vote at a rate comparable to that of the general populace. Student disparity is derived from the dissipation of student voters throughout the country. The lack of organized student voting blocs guarantees the continuation of political impotence. The best way to organize a student voting bloc is through the local community.

Berkely and Brown are two of the few schools in the country where students have a significant impact on community policy. Students there influence the national debate because a high percentage register locally. College students' widespread inability to influence our communities contributes to national ignorance of public interest issues of student concern, such as education and the environment.

Local action is the necessary prerequisite to national student empowerment. The traditional political order has sought to deny or limit citizenship to our educated class of Americans to prevent us from claiming our rightful voice in community affairs. The restrictions have many faces. Some cities such as Syracuse have out-of-town students from registering where they live eight months out of the year. Some states have statutes which place tax and financial aid barriers on their youths who register to vote in another state. Deciding to be politically active in Williamstown takes only nine minutes, however, and it has important political ramifications.

The principle of local student political action against a restrictive system having a national effect was powerfully demonstrated by Czechoslovakian student protests last fall. Opposed by factors including a static bureaucracy, the memory of a failed student revolution in 1968 and a divided multi-ethnic culture, Czech and Slovak students were able to create a new political order based on respect for intellectuals and freedom. Students being politically active on a local scale brought down a national government.

I know that my "let's relive the 1960s when people believed in freedom, man" rhetoric has been a bit thick and bombastic, but aside from issues of student unity and solidarity, there are several additional practical reasons why students should consider registering to vote in Williamstown.

First, unless your parents happen to be politicians, political issues in Williamstown are more likely to affect your life than political issues at home. Williams students (except juniors studying abroad) spend seven months out of every year in Williamstown. For this reason, Williamstown political issues such as the proposed widening of Route Two have a greater impact on our lives than political decisions made at home.

Second, registering locally invests students in the local political scene, forcing them to become more aware of Williamstown community issues. How many students on campus know that Massachusetts was forcing Williamstown to widen Route Two? Greater student awareness of local concerns promotes better Town-Gown relations.

Third, registering locally will encourage the town to pay more attention to student concerns. Last year when Brian Coen '92 ran for Town Selectman on an environmentalist platform, he received less than 100 votes. Sensing the lack of a community environmental mandate, the town is considering building projects with potentially devastating environmental consequences.

Fourth, registering locally simply makes it easier to vote. Absentee ballots are a pain. Why call long distance to your home Board of Elections and be put on hold for an hour just to be able to vote two weeks before an election on a local bond issue you know nothing about? It is a ten minute walk from Baxter to the Williamstown Public School where local votes are held.

Student voter registration is a right, but many communities treat it as a privilege. We are lucky enough to go to school in a community where students have already won the fight for political equality. Registering to vote and becoming politically active in Massachusetts is the best way for Williams College students to assert their collective political and social interests. Last year Massachusetts students enacted the strongest pollution prevention law in the country by working together to wield political power. Strength is in solidarity.

Information on local voter registration will be available at the MassPIRG table in Baxter Mailroom Wednesday, Thursday and Friday. Think globally, vote locally.

About 50 African-American students staged a demonstration by taking over the admissions office at Wesleyan on Friday, January 26 in the hopes of presenting a list of demands to the Board of Trustees. The group entered the office and passed out declarations stating their intentions and requesting all personnel and guests to leave the office for an hour. The students then asked to present President William Chase with the demands in the presence of the trustees who were in a private meeting at the president's office. The President was informed immediately and met with the students, and the informal discussion was joined by an African-American trustee at the request of the students. However, the group was not allowed to present their demands at the meeting. "It was a complete and utter slap in the face. They shut the lines of communication themselves," said Kofi Taha, a member of the group. The document that the students handed out hinted that the nature of future protests could change. It said that this was a "peaceful protest, perhaps for the last time."

Students in a "Veterinary Virology" class were addressed by a Tina Turner look-alike when Professor Virginia S. Hinshaw donned a wig, leather jacket, mini-skirt and boots to present her topic on animal virology. She used the costume to present her students with a scenario from the movie "Mad Max Beyond Thunderdome." Students were given the mission of caring for the methane-producing pigs that provided the energy for Barter Town, as shown in the movie. "It's an engaging way to learn about how to identify and diagnose viruses in animals like pigs," Hinshaw said. She said she chose the idea to set the class at ease and encourage them to participate actively in problem-solving exercises.

The Theta Xi chapter at the University of Washington was recently disciplined for an odd hazing incident involving female sheep and members and pledges dressed only in their underwear. Acting on a complaint, the police visited the frat house and found the two stolen sheep, "overheated and agitated," while members and pledges were smeared with grease and peanut butter. The fraternity has been expelled from the institutions Interfraternity Council and suspended by the national fraternity. The case was referred to detectives for further investigation, as no one seems to know what was going on.

Nosehairs, Nazi-haters and the utterly absurd English language

by Thomas Buck

Here is the logic: ask not what your country can do for your nosehairs, but what your nosehairs can do for your country.

Which brings me to my main point -- the English is a very sneaky language, sad and dishonest too. Words aren't descriptive enough. It's sad; it really is. What kind of a noun is nosehair? For, indeed, it's not even a noun. It's two words smashed ensemble and held together with very weak linguistic glue because a bunch of backwoods hicks from Cheshire, England (population four) were too bloody lazy to think up something new.

Here in France, they have real words. Head hair is cheveux. Nose hair is poils. No hair is rien. Ici, fish have no bones; they're considered boneless. Instead, they have arretes, which makes a lot of sense if you think about it. After all, what are bones? The stuff of elephants and ungulates.

I've bashed our motherland of a language enough.

I had a drink with a French Resistance fighter yesterday. He was very small and very wicked and his name was Le Coq. He liked me -- he toasted America, he toasted my being American, and then he said, "This is the life."

"Ah oui, c'est la vie," I added. "Oh no," he insisted. "No, this, this is the life."

He smiled and I thought I saw the logic tied to his tongue hidden behind those bad teeth. I laughed. "This is the life."

There was a group of scraggly-clad Germans next to me. They were pounding shots, and one of them said, "Yah, zis is the life."

The tiny officer turned towards him. "Shut up, salle Nazi!"

Zis is the life.

What I've decided to do in all my free time is simply this: wander, kind of Siddhartha my way around Paris, get off at random subway stops, purposely lose myself. And it's worked, or at least it's been enjoyable.

For instance, a square in the Latin Quarter, full of performing artists. A Japanese woman, small, dressed in black, performs the yellow string dance. Working between two sewer grates, she struggles slowly and painfully, dragging, pulling, laboring from one to the other, tying the string to the grate, then turning, beginning the journey, forever struggling back to the other one getting caught up in the string, tripping, choking, etcetera, until she fails. Life, baby, life.

And also this furious, English-speaking black man from Africa who picked people out from the crowd and then picked them apart. Like the Frenchman, the world's biggest hypocrite, the one who, when he sees a black man talking to a white woman, thinks he is a sex maniac; the one who when he sees a black man talking to a white man, thinks he is a homosexual; the one who, when he sees a black man not working, thinks he is lazy; the one who, when he sees a black man working, thinks he is in trouble.

Strange that France is where I see the greatest living -- English speaking -- alive; I've never seen anyone humiliate so many people so successfully before. Hemingway lived two doors down from me. Fitzgerald had an account at my bank. Sartre and Camus once bickered at the brasserie on the block.

Montparnasse and the life, zis is it.

On the record...

"It was fun. The college kid had a good head on her shoulders, if she could keep it there."
--Fifth-grader Mike Clemow on his Teach for America instructor, Amy Steele '90.

"I don't know. I've never met one."

--Another fifth-grader's response when asked to name his favorite dinosaur.

"If Buster could beat Mike Tyson, then Rich [Williams] could definitely make Tyson bleed."
--Basketball center Than Healy '91 on his teammate's fighting ability.

Students instruct local fifth-graders

by Dan Silverman

As part of an effort to establish and gain support for a chapter of the Teach for America program on the Williams campus, the group held a Teach for America Day on Saturday. Thirty-five fifth graders from Williamstown Elementary School spent the day at the college, participating in classes and other activities led by Williams students. The elementary school students had a day of education and fun while the collegians had the opportunity to experience the joys and trials of teaching.

Teach for America is a private program that will train and send college graduates to teach in inner city and rural areas with chronic teacher shortages starting next year. Teach for America Day, which had students participating at nearly 100 colleges and universities in communities around the country, was organized to generate interest in the program and give college students a taste of real teaching.

Alison Bonner '92, the chapter head at Williams, enlisted student volunteers to guide the Williamstown visitors around the campus and to teach various classes. The day began with three class periods where the fifth graders could choose from eight different subjects ranging from acting to dinosaurs.

"It was fun," fifth grade dinosaur enthusiast Mike Clemow said. "The college kid had a good head on her shoulder, if she could keep it there."

Dinosaurs and geology
Clemow participated in the dinosaur/geology class taught by Amy Steele '90. The class went over some of the basic theories covered in Geology 101 at Williams with emphasis placed on the popular lizard. Teacher and students maintained a cutting repartee throughout the half hour period.

To Steele's question, "What's your favorite dinosaur?" one future Williams student replied, "I don't know. I've never met one."

Beyond the Bubble

Soviet Communist Party ends its power monopoly

The Communist Party's governing Central Committee decided last Wednesday to abandon its more than 70-year monopoly of power and shift to a Western-style presidential and cabinet system. The party's leadership agreed to give up their guaranteed primacy in response to Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev's call for a pluralistic political system. In a speech to the Central Committee last Monday, Gorbachev asked that the party end its 75-year constitutional monopoly on power and accept the possibility of rival political parties.

The Communist Party will no longer play a constitutionally guaranteed role in Soviet politics. "Society itself will decide whether it wishes to adopt our policies," Politburo member Aleksandr N. Yakovlev said. "Yakovlev" is one of the major forces behind the Kremlin's restructuring policies.

The Central Committee also agreed to give unspecified additional executive powers to the president. Members of the committee acknowledged that they were simply recommending, not demanding, possible changes for the nation's Parliament to enact.

"The crux of the party's renewal is the need to get rid of everything that tied it to the authoritarian-bureaucratic system, a system that left its mark not only on methods of work and interrelationships within the party, but also on ideology, ways of thinking and notions of socialism," Gorbachev said.

Gorbachev accepts deep cuts in Europe

President Mikhail S. Gorbachev said Saturday that the Soviet Union is prepared to accept President George Bush's recent proposal for deep cuts in troop levels in Europe. He insisted, though, that the two superpowers have equal troop levels following the reduction.

In his State of the Union message, Bush had proposed limiting each force to 195,000 in Central Europe. The United States would have an additional 30,000 troops located elsewhere in Europe. This proposal would involve a 60,000 reduction for the United States and a 370,000 cut for the Soviets.

At the Moscow meeting between Secretary of State James A. Baker 3d and the Soviet leader, Baker announced one concession. The United States, he said, might be willing to accept a unified Germany that was not a full member of NATO, but that might have a looser "association."

Savings bailout official resigns

The top administrator of the federal agency that is overseeing the Government's savings and loan bailout resigned Friday in what has been seen as another sign that the $159 billion program is faltering. Daniel P. Kearney, who had been president and chief executive of the Oversight Board of the Resolution Trust Corporation, said he had not been given sufficient authority to carry out his duties effectively.

The program, which was passed by Congress at President Bush's urging in August, authorized $159 billion over 10 years to shut or sell more than 500 insolvent savings and loan institutions.

Trustees stress need for budget restraint

by Keith Hedlund

Staring up the foreboding cloud of economic hardship rising on 1990's higher education, the president and trustees of Williams College convened in late January to discuss, among other topics, the potential need for budget restraint in coming years.

"There are storm warnings on the horizon about the economy and higher education relating to fees, tuition, salaries, and ongoing programs," Vice President for Alumni Relations and Development Hodge Markgraf said.

Markgraf said the board dedicated much of the meeting to speaking in general terms on the subject. "There was a fairly lengthy discussion participated in by most of the board members about the whole nervousness of the economic situation for higher education in this coming decade," he said. "The news is that for the near-term future, financial restraint is going to be necessary at all universities and colleges, public and private."

"We face that with concern, not apprehension, because we've had good budget processes here," Markgraf said. "We have not been wildly extravagant in the 80's, and hence I don't think we have to have a major retrenchment mode in the 90's."

According to the Chronicle of Higher Education, many well-known colleges and universities will have to face major cutbacks in the next few years. Dartmouth College is considering a proposal to lay off 60 faculty members and cut its budget by two to three million dollars. Cornell University is considering a four percent reduction in its faculty, and Johns Hopkins University a 10 percent reduction.

Less expansion in future

Markgraf said Williams is not considering such drastic measures. "It's not as much cutbacks as less expansion. We're slowing the rate of increase down. We're not throwing the ship in reverse. But it is still sobering in terms of the rate at which expansion will have to taper off."

He said that the 21-member board, in looking ahead to the setting of tuition and fees at their April meeting, wants to keep tuition down in order to maintain or improve Williams' marketability, but also wants the college to worry about expenditures.

"Obviously, tuition and fees will go up," Markgraf said. "But they will probably go up less than they have in the past."

Georgian music

On a higher note, Lisa Kahle '91, Debra Kassoff '92 and Louise Price '91 discussed and performed Georgian music. The three Williams students, who are all involved in music groups on campus, said they found that music permeated all of Georgian life.

The trio sang a melodic rendition of a favorite Georgian folk song, whose lyrics include the line, "If people don't like the way we are, may they have knives stuck in their hearts."

Darcey McCuaig '92 gave a presentation on various environmental issues facing the Soviet Union. She said she was shocked by the filthy rivers, air pollution and the amount of trash all over the streets and parkways of Soviet cities. Environmental dangers, especially pollution, pose a much greater problem for the Soviet people than their counterparts in the U.S., McCuaig said.

"Imagine walking home from school and getting a skin rash from the pollutants in the air," she said.

Lower export restrictions

McCuaig suggested the United States lower restrictions on the export to the Soviet Union of technology which reduces industrial pollution. She said she felt this would help the Soviets combat what is a global problem.

The evening ended with a presentation about the Soviet black market by Patricia Del Valle '90, Ivan Fernon '92, Martio Safford '92 and David Todé '92.

Del Valle said that corruption and bribery permeate every aspect of Soviet life. She explained how the black market in the Soviet Union includes much more than trading T-shirts for Levi's. The black market works to trading for dollars, favors and privileges, Del Valle said.

Safford and Todé told of friends they made in their hotel who were professional black marketers. These Russian entrepreneurs told them that they had bribed their way into the hotel in order to have easy access to trade with foreign visitors like the Williams students.

Two students, Todd Fernandez '91 and Lisa Kaesner '91, remained in Georgia to study at Tbilisi State University during second semester.

led a well-attended art class where the students read a Shel Silverstein poem and then drew their impressions about the poem together on a large sheet of paper. The final products will be displayed in Baxter next week.

"It was good to get the chance to teach. In art history teaching is a great way to tell if you know it yourself," Mandel said.

Another popular class, especially as lunch time drew near, was a programming exercise involving the making of a peanut butter and jelly sandwich taught by Joe Osterman '90. The idea was for the students to instruct Osterman, in the way one would instruct a computer, precisely how to construct the sandwich.

Group sign painting

After the classes everyone went to Lasell Gym for basketball, elbow tag and a paper airplane throwing. This was followed by lunch and then a group sign painting project for Teach for America.

"The kids seemed to be very enthusiastic and enjoyed all the activities," Williams Elementary School teacher Bob Mastroianni said. "Teach for America is a very good idea. Liberal Arts students with a real interest in teaching are an untapped source that needs to be utilized."

The Williams students said they were also pleased with the day and the future prospects for the Teach for America program.

"It's definitely a hair-raising experience. It's hard to keep the kids under control. But it's very rewarding," Andrew Stern '90 said.

"Teach for America is the best program I've heard of," Osterman said. "I want to teach in a public school, and I don't want to send out 500 letters to places that don't have openings. My only hesitation is that I'd like to be able to better master the trade before I'd enter the most difficult areas to teach."

Psychology class debunks TV ads

by Tony Ellison

Over Winter Study, sixteen students enrolled in PSYC-010, "Science and TV Commercials," devoted their academic concerns to television. The class investigated television advertising, splitting up into four groups which studied individual advertising claims. These claims were the differences between Diet Pepsi and Diet Coke, the effectiveness of Slim-Fast as a hunger suppressant, the lasting flavor of Extra gum and the ability of Saran Wrap to shield food odors. After various experiments and data analysis, the students in these projects debunked several of Madison Avenue's pretensions.

According to Associate Professor of Psychology Paul Solomon, the course, which has been offered three times to date, was inspired by doubts surrounding TV ads which he thought were hiding under a thin veneer of scientific credibility.

"The course content was largely student-determined, with students deciding topics of analysis and experimental procedure among themselves," Solomon said.

Saran Wrap alone among the products studied escaped with honor. The group tested the product by recreating an ad experiment. In one ad, the Saran Wrap company said, "A bear won't eat what it can't smell."

Seeking to test Saran Wrap's ability to screen food smells in a manner consistent with the commercial's claim, students first had to find a suitable bear substitute, and turned to man's best friend.

"We were asking strangers walking dogs in the street, anybody," Pam Volpe '91 said of the efforts to recruit study participants.

Saran Wrap vs. Reynolds Wrap

Twenty-four dogs were eventually tested three times each. The dogs were given choices between Saran-Wrapped and Reynolds-Wrapped meats. The canines favored the Reynolds-Wrapped samples by a 2:1 ratio. The group concluded that this was enough evidence to support Saran Wrap's claims as an effective odor shield.

In the analysis of Extra gum, the study team collected data from a test group of 30 students. Working from an ad which claimed, "Extra Sugar Free Gum has extra flavor that lasts an extra, extra, extra long time," the subjects completed questionnaires on flavor, juiciness and softness every six minutes while they chewed a gum sample. The products used for comparison were Carefree and Trident.

Ultimately, the only characteristic discerning Extra was its softness, which was not a selling point in its commercial campaign. Also, despite Tommy Leonard's weight loss and endorsement, Slim-Fast was found to be ineffective in curbing appetite. Three groups of subjects were studied: a control group, a group which drank Slim-Fast before meals for four days and milk before meals for the next four days, and a third group which did the reverse.

The rationality behind this seeming duplication of groups was to ensure a balance of variable factors in the final statistical study, according to Tom Harvey '91. After analysis of caloric data, Slim-Fast was found to have practically no effect whatsoever on appetite.

"The difference between Slim-Fast drinkers and milk drinkers was equivalent to six calories, or maybe an olive or two per day," Amy Sachleben '92 said.

Cola tests garner publicity

The cola taste tests received perhaps the most publicity of the four experiments. According to Solomon, several radio and television shows covered the campus cola wars and their findings. Even CNN was rumored to have found them worthy of notice.

The taste tests were conducted on 80 randomly selected students. According to Dean Caven '90, each subject drank three samples of cola, two of which were the same brand.

Caven explained that identifications were made by ranking preferences of each drink. If the first and third choices were of the same brand, the subject was judged to have made no choice. Although several people tested claimed to be "die-hard" drinkers of either Diet Pepsi or Diet Coke, only 14 could consistently differentiate the two. They also saw this as grounds to question Ray Charles' judgment in a recent ad for Diet Pepsi.

In that ad, Charles grimaced and said, "All right now, who's the wiseguy?" as his Diet Pepsi was replaced with Diet Coke. The statistics showed that it was unlikely that Charles would have been able to tell the difference between the two tastes.

"There were no statistically significant numbers supporting either cola's claim for superiority," Caven said. The students in the class felt they were the wiser for their Winter Study projects, and were brimming with desire to take on other commercials.

"I'll be watching TV and disproving just about any commercial... It's interesting to think about commercials, because you're really not supposed to," Volpe said.

Darrow lectures on the role which Islamic mysticism plays in Sufism

by Navin Girishankar

Dean of Freshmen and Associate Professor of Religion William Darrow delivered the second of seven lectures in the 1990 Faculty Lecture Series. The lecture, entitled "The Vision of God and Other Lesser Lights," explored the world of Islamic mysticism in the tradition of Sufism.

Darrow, an expert on Islamic culture and religion, is also well versed in comparative religion, Zoroastrian traditions, and contemporary Islamic thought. He was the recipient of the National Endowment for the Humanities fellowship in 1986 for the study of religious plurality in medieval Islam.

The lecture on the Sufist tradition centered around the great epic poem, "The Language or Conference of the Birds." The epic, written in 1178, is the work of Farid ud-Din Attar (c. 1119-1206), a Sufi poet and thinker.

"Attar is the author of a number of lyrical poems, both secular and religious, of a monumental biography of the Sufi saints of Islam, and of epic poems dealing with Sufi themes," Darrow said.

The themes of Sufism that Darrow touched on included desire, passion, divine love and the quest for God. The idea of death is prevalent in the Sufi writings and in the art of the period.

Darrow related a Sufi maxim of life: "Die before you die." -Cut off connections to the world before you inevitably leave it."

Influence of love
He noted that Sufism originated in an atmosphere of asceticism that would later feel the influence of the theme of love. He also touched upon the duality of passion and detachment in Sufi thought.

"Passionate love and the transmutation of passionate love into divine love - the theme of love came to eclipse the earlier asceticism," Darrow said. "Intertwining the themes of passion and detachment is at the heart of Sufism. Love, even misplaced and illicit love, was better than being stuck in the rut of life. It constituted another mode of detachment from the hum-drum of daily life."

Darrow concentrated on Attar's themes of life that accompany the Sufi on his journey towards God in "The Conference of the Birds." The journey of the birds to find the bird-king, the Simurgh, is similar to the quest for the vision of God. A Sufi's life on earth is touched in great part by two human establishments - writing and kingship. The nature of writing and kingship is that of a separation from God, Darrow said.

"First we are reminded that writing and kingship are both signs of sin," he said. "Writing is a sign of our separation from each other and God... With both writing and kingship, trickery and deceit are both appropriate actions. They make transformation possible."

"Through the pen, we have been taught what we did not know." The pen is not a perfect mode because it is closely tied to tyranny and kings. Darrow said, "It's the make of our separations. But sometimes writing does work. It teaches and affects transformation. In remembering these transformations, we can submit in gratitude to Him. This call for submission is, of course, the heart of the Muslim message."

Importance of writing
Darrow continued writing the way in which Attar used writing as a means to understanding. He stressed the importance of writing itself even though it separates men from God.

"Recently there has been a tendency in the study of religion to radically question the importance of writing because scriptures like the Qur'an do not exist as books or mock shelves but in the hearts of their believers. I don't question this but I think the point has been too starkly made because what one celebrates above all is the beauty of the written word. Writing is the primary mode of revelation," Darrow said.

The duality of writing as a sin and a means to revelation is the essence of Attar's work. In fact, upon reaching the court of the Simurgh, the birds, in the epic poem, are handed a piece of writing and revelation.

"Through the pen, we have been taught what we did not know." The pen is not a perfect mode because it is closely tied to tyranny and kings. Darrow said, "It's the make of our separations. But sometimes writing does work. It teaches and affects transformation. In remembering these transformations, we can submit in gratitude to Him. This call for submission is, of course, the heart of the Muslim message."

The three officers then proceeded to walk through Prospect House in search of house officers, according to Musher. This was confirmed by several Prospect residents, who encountered officers in the stairwells looking for Weisberg.

'It seemed they were just looking to bust someone.'

The officers located her, Cumming and Schnecberger, and informed them that they were being charged with furnishing alcohol to underage persons. Harris, the fourth house officer, was later charged as well.

"The party plan said the party would end at two," Schnecberger said. "The alcohol was gone long before that," Weisberg and Cumming refused to comment on either the charges against them or on the incident itself. Harris was unavailable for comment.

If convicted of the charge of furnishing alcohol to minors, the four could be subject to a fine accompanied by a possible prison term.

All four students will be arraigned in Northern Berkshire District Court in North Adams. Williamstown Police personnel said that they did not know when the hearing will take place. However, it is common for an arraignment not to occur until several weeks after charges have been filed.

Dean of the College Stephen Fix refused to comment on the incident, but said he would make a statement later in the week after he had reviewed the situation. Director of Security Ransom Jenks also refused to comment on the incident, saying it would be entirely handled by the Dean's Office.

Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are Dead

by Mike Reisman

Entertainment and art need not be mutually exclusive, but combining the two in a theatrical production is often difficult.

Last week's C and B's production of Tom Stoppard's Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are Dead made a valiant attempt at blending comedy and tragedy, but fell short of its goal despite some outstanding performances.

Don't get me wrong; the nuances of the text, the double entendres and allusions were all brought out vividly in Stuart Gutman's direction, and the staging was innovative. The problems, however, developed toward the end of the play as comedy attempted to transform itself into serious social commentary and the effort began to lag.

Director Stuart Gutman '90 played the text for its comedy, which was an integral part of its overall theme. However, there seemed to be a break in that emphasis, and the result was a muddled conclusion. One was left puzzled as to why the actors had themselves been puzzled for three hours. Their coin and word games were hilarious, but didn't offer an explanation of their situation. More importantly, it was never clear, to them or to the audience, why this was the case. To be fair, the timing of the production of this play put it in the critical spotlight and completed a dialogue which has developed recently between Williams productions of Beckett's Waiting for Godot and Shakespeare's Hamlet, the two plays which directly influenced Stoppard's work.

The audience seemed to know the play quite well and was able to appreciate the subtle word-play and the fast-paced theatrical games. A less enlightened audience might have been lost. However, theatre is not about the obvious, and good theatre forces the audience to work along with the actors in creating the play.

Geoff Gibson '92, as Guildenstern, and Steve Scoville '91, as Rosencrantz, each brilliantly projected the whimsical nature of their characters, while leaving enough energy to allow for the more serious moments. Gibson, with his powerful voice and amazing range of gestures, seemed to drive beyond the intentions of the production. While Scoville's sense of comic timing was masterful, one could detect a slight excess of the demureness that is his trademark.

Energy lag

One of the problems Gutman faced was Stoppard's text itself, which is geared towards the British idiom and is far too long. The comedy was almost always

'92 as the Player. Green's hawdy, self-assured "come pornographer" was right on the money. Moreover, the well-studied transformation from jester to metaplayer was one of the high points of the evening. More emphasis on the broader themes of the text was lacking in the overall production, but Green's work was a provocative synthesis.

The tragedians seemed to be excess cargo much of the time, cardboard caricatures who, with the exception of Alfred, sympathetically played by Scott Caspell '92, only occasionally became relevant to the action. Most of the time they plodded across the stage, igniting laughter but remaining enigmatic.

The seriousness of the Hamlet characters was a good foil to the ribaldry of the players. However, some of the characterizations were too clichéd and undeveloped to provide more than a reminder of the role that their characters had played in sealing the fate that befell Rosencrantz and Guildenstern. They really were in a different play.

Energy lag

One of the problems Gutman faced was Stoppard's text itself, which is geared towards the British idiom and is far too long. The comedy was almost always well executed, but the energy began to lag as the audience seemed to be one step ahead of the actors. Cuts would have been difficult, but might have eased the fatigue level a bit.

Liz Greenman '91 designed an ambitious set composed of rising platforms gracing a courtyard. This set gave life to the Hamlet setting and the luxurious costumes. Designed by Greenman and Ellen Waggett '90, and eliminated any doubts about the play's integral connection to Hamlet.

The lighting, also designed by Waggett, harshly enhanced the sense of despair and futility that developed through the play. The music seemed a bit overstated, even evoking the technical problems encountered on opening night.

The ship scene, Act II, included an ingenious series of boxes that were placed above traps in the stage, allowing the characters to exit and enter through the space. However, this effect seemed to be used more as comic relief, with heads bobbing out of alternating boxes at a frenzied pace, instead of enhancing the mystical quality of the tragedians.

Skaters end home slate with tough losses to Hamilton and Colgate

by Kathleen Lapey and Kristin Moomaw

The women's hockey team had a rough week as they dropped a pair of games to upstate New York rivals Hamilton and Colgate.

On Saturday, they suffered a 3-2 loss against an evenly matched Hamilton squad. It looked as if there would be no hope for the women pucksters, as Hamilton scored twice in the first four minutes of the game.

Following the two goals, though, coach son made a perfect centering pass to Holly Christensen '92, who poked the puck into the Hamilton net for a goal worthy of the highlight film. Minutes later, Hamilton once again increased their lead to two goals on a solid backhand shot that eluded fifth keeper Sue Picher '90.

In the third period, tri-captain Kara Lynch '90 won around player after player until she was all alone against the goalie. Demonstrating instincts honed by her extensive hockey background, Lynch waited for the goalie to make her play before lofting the puck into the upper right hand corner.

Women's hockey

James Briggs' troops displayed a sense of renewed desire that continued until the final whistle. Defensive rushes by Hilary Klotz '90 and tri-captain Kristin Moomaw '90 sparked the second period offense.

The first Williams goal occurred as Moomaw skated the puck from end to end, and tri-captain Jill Magnuson '90 picked up Moomaw's rebound. Magnuson the week was far more frustrating. The two teams skated evenly, but Williams was outshot 36-13. What more needs to be said?

The rookie team opened their season this week with a 4-1 loss against the Salisbury School For Boys. Although the boys were faster skaters, the Williams women outpositioned them, an advantage that led to an even contest.

Freshman goalie Alexandra Novitski stopped shot after shot, earning 31 saves. Fierce defense by van Horne, Chanel O'Neill '92, and Sarah Oeljen '93 pushed the play to the outside. Aggressive play by Nicki Bouvier '92, Lela Means '93 and Barbara Spooner '93 frequently left the Salisbury boys dazed and confused.

Williams' lone goal came with one minute remaining in the third period, as a vicious slash against Alex Hyde '93 resulted in a penalty shot. She displayed her stick-handling prowess with a deke that brought the crowd to its feet.

This week, the parent squad wraps up their 1989-90 campaign as it takes to the road for a game at Brown tonight and the season closer against Westleyan on Saturday.

age by qualifying for a return trip to defend his title.

Bringing timeless Eph glory upon themselves and their families with victories were Benson in the 100 back and 400 IM, Snyder in the mile, Gus Kohn '93 in the 50 free, Greg Jordan '92 in the 200 fly, Cleoza in the 200 back and Kirkpatrick '93 in the 100 free.

The women were tuning up for their New England championships, which stand only two weeks in the future. The woman of the hour was Liz Eberhart '92. When she stepped up to the blocks before her 200 fly, everything was calm. When the race was over, though, she had blown the heat away and recaptured her school record with a blistering 2:11.54, breaking the old record held by teammate Liz Hickey '93 for only three weeks) by two seconds. She also captured the 50 fly.

Leslie Nye '93 captured two events, with a surprise appearance and win in the 500 free and a victory in the 200 free. Dore Lebeau '91 got back on track with wins in the 50 and 200 backstrokes. Ulla Pitha '93 won the 200 breast and the 400 IM.

In diving, divers Patty Althoff '92 and Kathia Vandevonne '91 traded victories, with Althoff taking the 1-meter and Vandevonne taking the 3-meter. Freemer also scored a geriatric victory in the 1000/1650 freestyle. Lee Schroeder '91 showed her mettle with a blistering victory in the 50 free.

This was the final dual meet of the season for the women. The men swim at RPI on Tuesday in a match that will be followed by time trials for any women who haven't made New England cuts. The women's next meet is the New England meet in two weeks at Bowdoin.

The men's championships, which will be held here at Williams, is the week after, and is notable in that it brings more bald men together in one place than any event since perhaps the all-world hair growth conference.

Downhillers ski well despite warm weather

by Kerr Houston

Ignoring temperatures that seemed more conducive to water skiing than downhill skiing, the Williams Alpine squads traveled to Dartmouth this weekend to take part in the Big Green Winter Carnival. In fact, the skiers and left coach Ed Gross' nodding his head and saying, "Overall, I was very satisfied."

In the giant slalom, held on Friday, Eric Gross '91 garnered a fifth-place finish and was followed by junior teammates Lindon Seed and Jason Priest, who wound up eighth and tenth, respectively. The trio left the Williams men in second overall in the giant slalom.

The next afternoon, Priest posted a dazzling third-place finish in the slalom, and Gross placed seventh. Senior captain J.P. Pauson served his way in a ninth-place finish, and, at the end of the day, the men once more found themselves in a comfortable second.

The women had a harder time, despite an excellent weekend by junior captain Amy Sullivan '91, who posted a ninth-place finish on Friday and followed that the next day with a seventh-place show.

ing Junior Amy Beliveau seemed hot on Sullivan's heels, as she skied her way to a 12th-place finish in the giant slalom and a tenth-place finish in Saturday's slalom. The team notched a fourth-place finish on Friday and a fifth-place finish on Saturday.

Coach Gross seemed pleased with the team's showing, but pointed to this weekend's Williams Winter Carnival. Gross said that he is looking for "a little cold weather, first of all, and a bit of a home hill advantage to maybe pull us through."

Disarmament groups use street theatre

by Deirdre Pappalardo

Tax day in Berkshire County will be more dramatic than usual this year as local post offices become the stage for street theatre performances advocating reductions in government military spending.

Berkshire SANE/Freeze, a national disarmament organization, and the Williams Disarmament Forum, headed by Betty Dunkum '90, are co-sponsoring improvisational group drama performances with the theme "Cut the Military Budget - Fund Community Needs." SANE/Freeze and the Disarmament Forum are developing the project in conjunction with BETA, the Berkshire Ensemble for Theatre Arts.

"We want to educate the community about the devastating effects of present government spending priorities, and to encourage participants to call for a shift in them," said Pamela Gilchrist, Executive Director of SANE/Freeze.

"I hope that residents will learn more about the budget process and the allocation of funds, which ignore urgent local concerns, such as housing, education, and the environment, while defense spending soars," she added.

SANE/Freeze is the union of the two largest national disarmament organizations, the Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy and the Nuclear Weapons Freeze Campaign.

According to Gilchrist, SANE/Freeze promotes economic diversification as an alternative to the arms race. "Not only are we paying for unnecessary weapons of mass destruction, we are bankrupting our economy, underfunding our schools and social service programs, and bequeathing a polluted earth to our children."

Although the Williams Disarmament Forum has worked with SANE/Freeze in the past by co-sponsoring events such as last year's lecture by survivors of the Hiroshima bombing, Dunkum said she is especially excited by this particular event in that it will enable the college and the community to interact.

"Usually, there is not much opportunity for this to occur. I think that's what makes this event particularly exciting, what gives it a dynamic element," Dunkum said.

The BETA group has already begun a series of workshops and will act as consultants for street theatre productions. Williams students as well as local residents will perform in the productions.

Carla Weiss is the BETA member coordinating the Williamstown group. "Street theatre is a compelling and creative way to draw attention to an issue. Theatre can speak protest better than any language. "People are used to visual things, to an influx of materials - pamphlets, placards - but theatre is something different," Weiss continued. "It too catches your eye, but it also causes you to watch and stand still. If you see something dramatic, theatrical, you will stop, you won't just walk by."

The Williamstown group convened in the First Congregational Church Friday night, and participants shared their reasons for getting involved with the project. One man from the community told of his family's escape from Nazi Germany just before the war. He said that he wanted work to prevent destruction and promote understanding.

Williams students were also present at the organizational meeting. "I don't know what to expect from street theatre, but it should be an effective way of relating a political message," Michael Reisman '90 said. "Political action must go beyond the electoral college."

Kevin Ward '93 told of his participation in Peace Child last summer in the Soviet Union. Peace Child is a similar organization that expresses a political message through theatre. "What street theatre and Peace Child have in common is that they use the performing arts to convey a message. The performing arts are a powerful medium, which is something I found with Peace Child," Ward said.

Gilchrist and Dunkum said they are pleased with the response thus far and hope the event will foster a sense of community and encourage people to take the steps needed to influence Congressional legislators.

"I like to see people pay attention," Gilchrist said. "Street theatre, like the court jester, has long been a tool for communicating a difficult message. It doesn't require a lot of acting ability, just guts."

State fiscal crisis threatens MassMoCA

by Jerry Useem

The $35 million dollar plan to bring the Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art to Berkshire County has been plagued by threats of budget cuts due to a fiscal crisis in the state legislature. Despite these financial setbacks, those running the project are forging ahead with the agenda that was laid out in their feasibility study four months ago.

With the Massachusetts budget in tatters, legislators are looking to reduce spending by cutting programs. Many consider MassMoCA a prime candidate, regarding it as an extraneous project which is not vital to the welfare of the commonwealth.

According to Joseph Thompson, director of the MassMoCA executive planning group, it would not make sense for the state to cut MassMoCA's budget for several reasons.

"MassMoCA is a bonded project in a long-term capital expenditure," he said. "Although it's a $35 million project, the net cost for the state in next year's fiscal budget will be closer to $300,000. Its net cost out of year is quite small. It's not a line item in the budget. It's been discussed, but more for symbolic reasons than for anything else." The state legislature appropriated $35 million for the improvement of the economy of Northern Berkshire County in the spring of 1988, with the stipulation that precisely what the money would be used for would be an executive decision.

Governor's support

As long as MassMoCA has the governor's support, the future of the project is relatively sound. According to Thompson, Governor Michael Dukakis remains 100 percent behind MassMoCA. Whether or not the next governor will support the project - which is not expected to be finished until 1993, after Dukakis is out of office - is irrelevant, Thompson said.

"The project will be well underway by the time he leaves office," he said. "It will be significantly far enough along in the next two months that the next governor's stance will not be a factor. We wouldn't start something that we can't finish."

State Rep. Sherwood Guemsey, D-Williamstown, expressed similar optimism that MassMoCA's future is not in danger.

"The bottom line is that MassMoCA will continue so long as the feasibility study is sound and the various agencies involved in assessing the feasibility study come forth with positive recommendations.

"These fiscal times cause an examination of everything in the budget, but there is a majority of support in the legislature and certainly from the governor," Guemsey said.

As for the opposition for MassMoCA in the legislature, Guemsey attributed it to that fact that representatives have been fighting to get their districts a bigger slice of the pie in the budget. They oppose MassMoCA because it will not directly benefit their area of the state, Guemsey said.

"It is clearly a mean-spirited and selfish attack," he said. "There are projects in their districts that they are fighting to save. What are we supposed to do, go attack their projects?"

March master-plan

Meanwhile, Thompson explained, the MassMoCA planning group is preparing to make its final presentation to the state in early March. It will put forward a comprehensive master-plan and feasibility study along with documents describing acquisition of land, buildings and art. The MassMoCA Cultural Development Commission will then put forth a recommendation to the executive office of the state, which will act on the recommendation and decide whether or not to go ahead with the project.

Thompson said that some work on the shell and core of the building will begin in the coming months, but that most of the major restoration will occur in 1991 and 1992, years two and three of the project. The planning group is also working on obtaining world-class contemporary art.

"We are working on documenting the commitments we have in hand, and it is also understood by the commission that the augmentation of the art collection is realistically a five-year project," Thompson said. "However, we'll have a substantial cornerstone collection in place before the project is begun."

"We're proceeding forward with the expectation that the project will be completed, but we're sensitive to the commonwealth's budgetary situation and are trying to work within that context," he said.

by rolling to victory in the mile and two-mile relay.

"I've never seen Williams dominate to such an extent," coach Peter Farwell said. The men appear to be primed for the post season, and they'll be heading north this weekend for the New England Division III championships in Lewiston, Maine at Bates College.

The consistently powerful Eph women had little problem dispatching with the female invaders of the Purple Valley. Sophomore Hilary Cairns leaped the field to win the 3000m in a time of 10:23, while junior Anne Platt set a Towne-Field House record in the 1500m with a blistering time of 4:45.

Kira Shields '91 won the 400m, while Allison Orsi '93 clocked an 8:82 mark in the 55m high hurdles, beating the school record by a full tenth of a second. Senior co-captain Susan Gray won the 500m, while sophomore Cherie Macauley raced to victory in the 100m and junior Kim Bamdollar won the 800m decisively. The women continued with the domination in the relays, triumphing in the mile relay by eight seconds and the two-mile relay by 41 seconds.

"I was very surprised that we ran as fast as we did today, as most of the runners were using today's races as preparation for the Smith race next week," women's distance coach Lawrence Bell said. The Eph women invade Northampton this coming weekend for a meet at Smith College.

Freshman Allison Orsi eases her way over the bar during Saturday's home track meet. Orsi also won the 55m high hurdles, setting a school record in the process. (Taylor)

Cagers fall to Hamilton after beating Mohawks

by Asli Bali

The women's varsity hoopsers, as they edge towards the end of their season hoping to improve their 7-8 record, might as well be on one end of the rope in a contest of tug of war. Nowhere was this more evident than in Saturday's struggle against Hamilton, a game that seemed to slip through the fingers of the Eph women despite a ferocious effort.

The week's slate of two games had begun on Tuesday, as the Eph women traveled down Route 2 for an away game at North Adams State. Williams clocked the Mohawks 58-34, as freshman sharpshooter Kerry Mularczyk led the way with 18 points. Junior Meg Brown tussled in 14, and her classmate Rebecca Borden scored 11.

Women's hoops

The upset loss to Hamilton proved a hard one to swallow, as the team was coming off the win over North Adams and seemed ready to put this one under their belts. Indeed, even in the waning moments of Saturday's game, it seemed likely that they would walk away with a win and an 8-7 mark. Williams started the game with a strong step forward, as the Eph women won the opening tip and quickly lit their half of the scoreboard. The Hamilton strategy early in the game was to keep pressure on Kris Broadhurst '92, because she was marked as a shooter. It was clear that Hamilton was ready to win this game, as their hustle and solid ballhandling kept Williams on the defensive, and their screens made the Eph women really work on their end of the court.

Best match all season

Johnson said that Wednesday's match against Trinity was the best match he had seen his team play all season. Although they lost 5-4, Johnson said it was this day where they displayed their improvement. "They've worked tremendously hard," he said. "They have become better match players, they are better fit and they've cleaned up the finer points of the game."

The Round Robin Tournament at Vassar during the February 3 weekend did not turn out as well as the squad had hoped. They thoroughly defeated Vassar, a team they had barely beaten at the Williams Round Robin Tournament earlier in the season, 8-1. That was the team's only win of the weekend. The Eph men lost to Cornell and Franklin and Marshall by identical 8-1 margins.

The men's squash team will attempt to improve on its winning record when they play Wesleyan on February 17.

Solution to last week's puzzle

Hamilton was playing a physical brand of hoops rarely seen outside the streets of New York, and the Eph women were getting mauled on the court. At the half the score was 20-17 for the Ephs, but they had to look forward to a very tough second half.

Hamilton was immediately out in the second half to regain territory. Each team was looking for a substantial lead, but neither seemed able to pull away.

A shouting match?

The Hamilton coach started getting vocal as the game continued to heat up. He alternated between yelling at the refs and yelling at the Ephs' coach Nancy Roberts, and his poor conduct finally came to a head with a controversy over the Hamilton shot clock after a whistle blew on the team. The tension in the gym built up as Hamilton fans began to hoot.

Hamilton broke away from Williams to gain a four-point advantage, but the Ephs immediately worked to retake their lead. They earned a 41-38 advantage with five minutes remaining in the game.

With two minutes left in the game, Meg Brown fouled out with seven points. The crowd cheered her, but it was clear that the animosity between Hamilton and Williams on the court was affecting the game.

Allison O'Brien, who led the Continentals throughout their game, sank her losses from the charity stripe and brought the Hamilton lead to three. Braden cut the Hamilton lead to one with bonus shots of her own and, with just under a minute left in the game, the Ephs were only down by one. Lucy stymied the Hamilton offense with her strong defense, but the Continentals regained possession on a jump ball.

Megan King '90 intercepted their inbound pass and drew a foul with thirty seconds left. King missed the foul shots and Hamilton, after tearing down the rebound, tried to use up the clock, but with thirteen seconds left, under pressure from Broadhurst, lost the ball out of bounds.

Quits an ending

The pressure of the game had even the fans quiet, as the last timeout of the game wound down. The Hamilton coach yelled his strategy to the team, shouting, "Foul them! Don't let them take the shot!" while Roberts, who knew her squad would have to look for the foul, instructed her team to keep shooting. The Eph women were going to try to use Hamilton's physicality, which had cost them so much in the game, against the Continentals by winning from the free throw line.

The clock started and Williams began shooting. The Eph women put up four shots, and appeared to get fouled on every one of them, but the referees and their whistles remained silent. Thirteen seconds the score remained unchanged, and Hamilton won.

The anger of the Williams team was reflected in their eyes, as both players and crowd seemed almost hostile. Roberts stayed back after the team had left the court, and was visibly angry. "The refs didn't have the guts to make the call at the end," she said. "We went for the foul and got it, but they just wouldn't call it. They'll never work in Williamstown again."

The hoopsers, with only four games remaining in this winter's play, face Trinity at home tomorrow night and then enliven Winter Carnival weekend with a home contest against Amherst on Saturday.

Ephs lift record to 14-3, face Amherst on Saturday

by Jeff Merritt

Two notable road trips in the world of sports this week yielded rather different results. Previously undefeated heavy-weight Mike Tyson travelled across the globe to Japan and was stripped of his title in a tremendous upset by little-known Buster Douglas.

Men's hoops

And the Williams men's basketball team, going into the week with a 12-3 record, was facing journeys to the less remote regions of Worcester, Massachusetts and New London, Connecticut. Flexing a little of their own muscle, the Eph men avoided the upset bug by posting convincing triumphs over the Worcester Polytechnic Institute (W.P.I.) Engineers and the Connecticut College Camels. The pair of victories extended the squad's winning streak to four games and lifted its season mark to 14-3.

Conte crushes Engineers

The Ephs defeated W.P.I. last Wednesday by a 75-63 margin, led by a season-high 27 points from sophomore guard John Conte. Conte was on fire in the second half, scoring 21 points to help Williams build upon a slim 31-29 halftime lead.

Rorke and mates down Bowdoin, fall to tough R.I.

by Augusto Torres

The Williams wrestlers took on two teams of very different ability levels in losing to Rhode Island College and beating Bowdoin.

Rhode Island, ranked 14th in the nation in Division III, trounced Williams and Bowdoin. The Williams grapplers, in turn, let many of their reserves finish off Bowdoin.

Although Williams went down to Rhode Island 33-9, the three grapplers on the team from North Andover rose to the occasion. Freshman Sean Rorke (177) won a tough one. Rorke was knocked out for fifteen seconds by an accidental collision with his opponent early in the match. Despite his unconscious spell and several nosebleeds, however, he beat an opponent which finished 4th in New England last year. Rorke was humble about his performance, noting that, "I had wrestled him before. I knew I could beat him." Rorke seems to use every tool he has to win matches. He says, "nosebleeds give me an edge. I can use it to my advantage. I got it down to an art." Coach Roger Caron said of him, "Rorke has untapped talents. He is a tough, tough kid."

Also scoring points for Williams against Rhode Island were sophomore Doug Dreffer (190), who dominated his match, winning 4-0, and freshman Bill Sullivan (118) who added another win to his record, 7-1.

The grapplers were at times careless, according to Coach Caron. Of freshman John Faciani's match, Caron said, "Faciani was winning 4-0, but managed to let himself get pinned by sloppiness on his own part." Sophomore Dylan Bloy entered the third period losing only 6-4. Caron said, "[he] ended up 15-8 in a match he could have won."

Williams usually beat hapless Bowdoin with a number of reserves getting a chance to perform. Freshman Paul Bernard (118) promptly pinned his opponent, Freshman Tom Savadove, who normally wrestles at 142 lbs., lost his match wrestling at the 150-pound class. Sophomores Jack Morton (158) and Dan Bryant (177), who wrestled 190, also recorded wins.

It has been 27 years since Williams has won the Little Three in wrestling. Wesleyan has dominated the previous decade and has home-field advantage this year. Amherst has a number of seniors on their team that has never been successful at the Little Three. But the Williams grapplers are confident they can take it.

Coach Caron said, "we've beat teams that are nationally ranked, and there is no reason we will not dispose of both of them. We will come back with that Little Three at all costs."

The Williams Nordic ski team faithfully followed the road signs that point to Hanover on Friday, but, as they climbed out of the team van, must have wondered if someone hadn't played a nasty trick on them. For Saturday's spring weather seemed much more appropriate to a summer's day in Cancun than a February afternoon at the Dartmouth Winter Carnival.

However, the skiers stuck around and soon found out that the unexpected warm spell was no joke; instead, it represented some of the most difficult conditions that the team has faced this year. The classic race on Friday was a waxing nightmare for all the coaches, with a course that ranged in composition from powder to ice to slush. The women fared well, however, on the difficult course, with its steep vertical climbs and icy downhill.

Lindley Hall '93 skied to a personal-best fifth-place finish, thereby leading the squad. With Kristen Froberg '90 and Nikki Kimball '93 in 12th and 13th, Williams was just barely edged out of third place by four points, winding up in fourth behind Vermont, Dartmouth, and Middlebury.

The men had a rougher time later in the day with washed-out tracks and temperatures that climbed to a toasty 50 degrees. They brought in an 8th-place ribbon, with Chad Gagnon '93 in 22nd, captain Tod Niedeck '90 and John Coezyr '92 tied in the 38th spot, and Jamie Spiess '91 as the final point scorer in 42nd.

The first relay of the season was a skating race held on Saturday in the miserable rain and puddles that covered the Dartmouth golf course. The women's race was an exciting one, with the Williams team of Froberg, Heidi Andersen '90, and Hall in hot pursuit of Middlebury and eventually winding up in fourth. The second team, which consisted of Kimball, Ann Bokman '91, and Kim Bowes '92, came in a close fifth.

The men's squad skied to a solid sixth-place finish, as Spiess, Niedeck, and freshman Luke Shullenburger skated an impressive race through slush and around puddles and developing ponds on the wet course.

Both teams will hope for colder weather and faster times as they remain home this weekend to host the Williams Winter Carnival.

The Eph men shot only 28 percent from the floor in the first half, but a solid defensive effort kept them a step ahead of the Engineers. The offense came to life in the second half, however, as Williams shot 57 percent from the floor and racked up 40 points, almost half of which were scored by Conte alone.

"We started clicking a lot more offensively in the second half," Coach Sheehy said, "and scoring 44 in one half is a pretty rare achievement for this year." The Engineers were able to keep the game within reach for ten minutes of the second half, but the Ephs built a comfortable lead down the stretch in put the game away.

In addition to the 27 points from Conte, Williams' Major '90 chipped in with 14 points and 10 rebounds, while Team Healy '91 netted 13 points and Lindsey Vaughan '92 contributed 10 points.

A sterling save for Conte
Conte's sterling effort came on seven-of-11 shooting from the field, which included five-of-nine from beyond the three-point line. He also was perfect on eight attempts from the charity stripe and led Williams with three steals on the night.

The sophomore's scoring totals from game to game have been as up and down as a yo-yo this season. His effort against the Engineers came directly on the heels of a game in which he was held scoreless by Wesleyan. He has reached the 20-point plateau on four different occasions this season, but in averaging only 13.2 points per game.

"Any sort of inconsistency might be a result of his adjustment to people playing a lot more defensive attention to him," Sheehy said. "Last year nobody knew about him, and before they realized what was going on he had hit a bunch of three-pointers. This year he's got to be mentioned prominently when other teams talk about their defensive game plans against us."

The final minutes of the contest were enlivened by an altercation between Rich Williams '90 and frustrated W.P.I. forward Chris Ayotte. Both players drew technical fouls after Williams took exception to Ayotte's chippy play and landed a solid right hook to the Engineer's forehead, drawing blood and breaking two small bones on top of his own right hand. Williams will attempt to complete his senior season before having his hand cased, but his shooting might be hampered by the injury.

"If Buster could beat Mike Tyson, then Rich could definitely make Tyson bleed," Healy said of Williams' possible future in the boxing ring.

Hockey gains share of Little 3 with win over Wesleyan

Three minutes later, Rick Laferriere '91, clearing the puck from behind his own blue line on a Wesleyan power play, let one rip toward the Cardinal net. "I tried to get a shot off on the net," he said. "I saw it curve left to right and I thought it might go in and it did."

The Eph men wasted no time getting back into the groove in the middle stanza, as Seguin punched the puck in for a 3-0 lead after only 39 seconds had ticked off the clock. After Dave Bakken '90 was assessed two minutes for roughing, Andrew Zimman '92 stole the puck at the Wesleyan blue line, diked the goalie, and ticked the Cardinal net for a 4-0 lead and the second Williams shorthanded goal of the evening.

The Eph men came out hitting hard in the third period to preserve the lead. At the 2:29 mark, Steve Wallace '91 was charged with a two-minute penalty for elbowing and Wesleyan was finally able to escape on a power play, narrowing the gap to 4-1.

The scoring ended when Williams ran a diagrammed play to perfection after a time-out. Seguin passed the disk to Van Belle at the post, and Van Belle wrapped it around and into the Wesleyan net for the final tally with 4:30 remaining in the game.

"We took it to them and set the pace and made Wesleyan play at our level," hard hitting sophomore Jeff DeToro said. "Tonight the Eph skaters return to the ice as they face the Continentals of Hamilton."

The Williams offense kept rolling against Connecticut College on Saturday, piling up its highest point total of the season in an 87-71 victory. The Eph men stretched a 42-36 halftime advantage to a 20-point bulge midway through the second half, and then coasted to a comfortable victory.

Major led the way with 24 points, eight rebounds and three assists, and three of his teammates also scored in double figures. Sophomore Sherman Jones scored 17 points, Vaughan added 15, and Conte pitched in with 11 points. Derric Small led all scorers with 28 points for the Camels, who dropped to 11-8 on the season.

Major still sits in second place on the all-time Williams scoring list with 1514 career points, now only 112 points shy of Tim Walsh '86.

The Ephs will be out for revenge when the Trinity Bantams come into Chandler tomorrow night. Trinity defeated Williams last season in a triple overtime thriller and then dashed the postseason hopes of the Eph men with an 80-66 victory in the E.C.A.C. tournament.

On Saturday night the Amherst Lord Jeffs will visit Chandler, looking to avenge a six-point Eph triumph in Amherst earlier in the season. Williams can clinch the Little Three title with a victory over the Defectors.

Athlete of the Week

This week's Athlete of the Week is freshman track standout Allison Orsi. Orsi led her team to an easy victory on Saturday by competing in both the high jump and the long jump, and then by setting a school record with an 8.82 time in the 55m high hurdles. Way to go, Allison!

Junior squad beats Conn. College after loss

J.V. Basketball endures late bus, poor refs, and tomblake gym

by Rashid Curtis

The j.v. hoopsers climbed onto the back of the Connecticut College Camels last week and rode to an impressive 71-60 win. After having their modest win streak broken earlier in the month by Little Three rival Wesleyan, the team

Men's j.v. hoops endured another loss in falling to W.P.I. before showing their mettle against the Camels.

As the hoopsers entered into Worcester Polytech's gym, several forces seemed to be working against them. Most important was the late arrival of the bus to W.P.I.'s gym, as the delay forced the Ephs to rush their game warm-up and to enter the game unfocused.

As a result, they played as though their game were "still on the bus." Furthermore, the gym resembled a pit and was so silent that cheers from the bench were almost swallowed.

Poor officiating only added to the list of woes, as was evidenced in a brief exchange that Eph coach Mike Masters had with one referee. The ball was knocked out of bounds and the ref called possession to Williams, only to reverse his call after hoisting from the other team's bench. "Are you going to change your call every time they yell loud enough?" Masters yelled, to which the ref responded, "What do you want me to do?"

When Saturday rolled around it was time for the j.v. Eph men to put all the bad days behind, and to start showing everyone what they were made of. As they walked into the Connecticut College gym there were recollections of the "pit," because of the dim lighting and arena effect of their gym. But the hoopsers had something to prove, so they quickly put all that aside.

In the locker room, coach Masters pointed to his starters and explained that it was time for them to shine and show leadership. It was clear from the beginning that the Williams' game. On the first possession Pat Duquette '93 shot a three-pointer, and then followed up with two buckets.

For the first time the j.v. hoopsers set the pace of the game. They set themselves in control of the game, and showed that they could play with their heads and their hearts. The result was a blowout.

What was the difference? Against the Camels the team got everyone involved in the game. Duquette had 30 points, while the freshmen "horses," John Engel, Wells Messersmith, and Wayne Franklin, combined for 21 points and 17 rebounds. Adam Brandt '93, who was not performing as usual, provided some important baskets and was flawless from the charity line. In comparison, only three players had scored against WPI and the inside game was almost nonexistent.

Now that the j.v. hoopsers have learned the formula that has proven to work, it is time for them to make it a habit. In the two upcoming games, which include a Wednesday contest against Trinity College and a Saturday showdown with the Lord Jeffs of Amherst, the Ephs will have the chance to show that they can.

Men's squash rolls by Lord Jeffs; now 10-8

by Rhonda Goodman

As starter's guns cracked, hockey helmets flashed, and basketball coaches yelled in a full state of games on campus Saturday afternoon, the men's squash team turned the courts into a blur of black rubber as they defeated longtime rival Amherst 5-4. The win was followed on Sunday with an 8-1 victory over Stony Brook that left the team's mark at 10-8 and gave Williams a winning week despite an earlier loss to the Bantams of Trinity.

Hopper's hands were full with his Amherst opponent, whose serves and backhands looked and felt like cannon balls. Although he lost the first game 10-15, he forced the second into extra points. Hopper led the tiebreaker 2-0; however, he lost the next three points and the second game 17-16. Frustrated, he lost his concentration and the final game 10-15.

Clayton drops close one

Clayton also did not get off to a good start, but he didn't take long to pull himself together. After being down in the first game 2-9, Clayton rallied to tie the game at 13-13, forcing the tiebreaker.

Again, after being down 0-3 in the tiebreaker, he tied the score, only to lose the final point and the first game 16-18.

The second game was jammed with let calls, with two coming at crucial points in the match and Clayton winding up on the short end of each point and eventually the game, falling 15-17.

Clayton rebounded to win the third game 15-8, playing long rallies and waiting for his opponent to make mistakes. He dished out more of the same in the fourth game, jumping out to a 11-6 lead. His opponent soon recovered, though, coming from behind to tie the game at 13-13, forcing the third tiebreaker of the match. Clayton hung tough, but lost the game and the match 13-15.

Pentz pockets one

Pentz's match had a happier ending for the Ephmen. He dominated the first game, winning 15-6. He was down in the second game 10-5 before coming from behind to lead the game at 14-12. But Pentz lost the next two points, forcing another tiebreaker in an afternoon full of the same.

Pentz didn't let this one fall from his grasp, winning the game 18-13. Nor did he waste any time winning the third game 15-12. Although it was very close, he proved to be the better player that day.

Skaters thrash Cardinals

by Joshua Brumberg

The men's hockey team had scored only 26 goals in its first 10 games, but this week the Eph offense exploded with 12 goals in two games. The squad started off the week with a 7-3 win over North Adams State College and followed that up with a 5-1 thrashing of Little Three rival Wesleyan.

"The team was shooting the puck more and being more creative offensively," coach Bill Kangas said in explanation of the offensive outburst. "The players seem hungrier, and as a result they're going to the net harder and, consequently, scoring more."

Thursday night's contest against the visiting Mohawks started slowly. The first scoring chance came about 14 minutes into the first stanza, as Williams goalie Sean Ford '90 foiled a North Adams breakaway.

Plentiful ties

The first twenty minutes of the game were very physical but the referees let the teams play, assessing only three penalties. The score remained knotted at 0-0 until the final minutes of the first stanza when the Williams defense fell apart during a line change. With Ford sprawled on the ice, a Mohawk skater lifted the puck over his pads at the 17:34 mark to give his squad a 1-0 lead as the teams headed to the locker rooms.

The Ephs returned to the ice in the second period and knotted the score after only 3:30, as assistant captain Ron VanBelle '90 found Chris Headrick '91 in the crease, and Headrick promptly poked the puck into the Mohawk net. The deadlock was short-lived, though. After a foiled Williams clearing attempt, the Mohawk center one-timed the biscuit from 20 feet over Ford's shoulder, giving the visitors a 2-1 advantage.

Just a minute later, however, Headrick fired a rebound into the North Adams cage to even the score once again. After a series of spectacular saves by Ford, Williams gained the lead on a goal from captain Bob Santry '90 off a pass from Tim Hale '91.

North Adams had grown rather fond of symmetry on the scoreboard, though, as a 30-foot Mohawk blast deadlocked the game at three apiece with 2:36 remaining in the second stanza.

Offensive outburst

The Ephmen sailed onto the ice for the third period and quickly took control of the contest. With five minutes elapsed a Jim Jasinski '93 shot bounced off the Mohawk goalie's pads and onto the stick of Mike Polomski '92, who put the puck in the back of the net. While this goal would prove to be enough for Williams, the offensive barrage was just beginning.

Exactly five minutes later Polomski ripped the cords again on an assist from his brother Phil Polomski '92 and Ian Smith '91. At the 11:38 mark of the final stanza Polomski completed his hat

Track teams dominate simple sport in home meet

by Joshua Brumberg

The Williams runners were home again this past weekend, hosting the Williams Invitational against Amherst and Wesleyan. The results can only be described as simply overwhelming.

The men's team scored 149 points while the combined total of their competitors reached a mere 110 points. The Ephmen placed first or second in 15 of the 17 events. The women faced stiffer competition from their rivals, but still ran away with a 46-point victory.

"Track is a simple sport," senior captain Dale Johnson said. "You run, you throw, you jump. Apparently Amherst and Wesleyan have not mastered these simple tasks. Williams dominates."

Ephmen dominate rivals

The Ephmen first proved that they had mastered the art of jumping, as sophomore Bradford Behr led Williams in the high jump with a personal best leap of 6' 3".

"Clearing 6' 3" felt absolutely awesome," Behr said. "Everything just clicked. I think the key to the jump was totally ignoring all external factors. I felt my back and hamstrings brush the bar as I went over and thought I had knocked it off, until I heard the crowd roar as I was coming down, so I knew I had made it even before I landed."

Geoffrey Igharo '90 led a Williams sweep of the triple jump, with Sal Salamone '93, David Wahl '93 and Derek Cusam '93 finishing second, third and fourth respectively.

Williams ran away with the meet on the track, winning or placing second in all of the races. The action began with the 1500m, in what proved to be one of the most exciting races of the day. Johnson broke out early and led the pack around the track, with freshmen Tony Werner and Seth McClennen close on his heels, while an Amherst runner was fighting for third place. Johnson and Werner extended their lead, and in the final lap Werner unleashed a savage finishing kick to pass Johnson and lead the Eph runners in a sweep of the first three places.

"My goal was to qualify for the New England Division III championships, and I did," Werner said of his victory.

The Eph sprinters next came to the forefront, with Salamone winning the 55m high hurdles, Larry Smith '92 claiming the 400m and John Walker '90 winning the 55m dash. Walker was followed closely by the other members of the Williams dashing trio, with Igharo taking second and Jonathan Lindley '92 finishing third. LaRon Batchelor '92 won the 200m in a most impressive manner in a time of 23.52 seconds.

The freshman tandem of Jeffrey Cooper and McClennen triumphed in the 800m and the 1000m, respectively. Johnson came back strong in the 3000m to win by five seconds. The Ephmen completed their devastating performance

Swimmers brush Colgate aside, now eye New Englands

by Mike Lane

The men's and women's swim teams made their final home dual meet appearance Saturday against Colgate. Both teams were victorious, with the men winning 150-115 and the women 199-130.

The traditional honoring of the seniors occurred, as the team bade a fond farewell to Michelle Freeman, Carol Puggenburg, Beth Worley, Matt Esposito, Chris Cieszy, Dan Snyder, Mike Lane and Rob Benson. They have all earned a Ceteris (cocktail) and will be put out to stud this spring.

With the effects of the infamous "ban period" beginning to show, the well-rested Ephmen went into the meet attempting to break a three-week slump and qualify several individuals for the New Englands championships and the Division III nationals.

When the smoke cleared, swimmers John Staudemayer '92, Tim Curry '91, Tom Hall '93 and Paul Piquado '93 showed that the ancient training practice of throwing kickboards still worked when they achieved New Englands time standards. Defending nationals 400 IM champion Benson showed that he gets better with

by Kerr Houston

It's 9:15 on a Sunday evening, and I wander down to Chandler Sunday Night League. There's not much of a crowd; some teams gathered early on the sidelines, and a couple of people slouched against the folded bleachers. But the gym feels alive, somehow. Maybe it's the echo of the balls or the thunder of sneakers from the two games in progress. Or maybe it's the dreams these guys carry with them.

I wander up to Tom La Porte '92, who's stretching out for his game. I ask him why he's down here. "I played 11M's in high school." He raises one arm sarcastically. "Junior year champs."

There's a 35-year-old on one court. He's maturing east to west, as they say. He's pulling up and sticks the three.

Tim Shea '90 is warming up on the sidelines. "It's fun," he explains. "It doesn't really matter who wins or loses." He tells me, and smiles. "At least, not until the game starts."

I make my way upstairs to the balcony, where an old bearded man turns from game to game from his bird's-eye vantage point. I look down and see that the faculty is playing. I've heard that they're the team to beat, so I ask this guy about their chances tonight. He looks down and says, "they're fielding two teams tonight, and I don't know if that will

A close affair

The Sand Band, despite an aggressive man-to-man defense, is trailing the Pub 17-12. Tim, wearing the black shirt of the Pub, pulls up and throws in the longest three-pointer I've ever seen in this gym.

At halftime, I talk to Chen Sides '92, the scorekeeper, wondering how he got this job. "Well, I was planning to watch this game, and one of the referees came up to me and..."

There's no huddle or chalkboard session at the half. The Pub goes to get water while the Sand Band grabs some balls and keeps shooting. Mike Hyde '91, who moonlights as a defensive back and leadoff hitter when he's not refing 1M, blows into his whistle. "Was that emphatic enough?" he asks.

Tim buries another three and the Sand Band calls a timeout. I ask Tom what's wrong. "Live and die by the J," he tells me with a grin.

During the timeout, Chen asks one of the refs, "who was the last foul on?" "I have no idea," he says, and looks to the blue huddle for familiar faces. "Schneeberger."

Minutes later, the game has turned into a virtual three-point contest. College Council president Sanand Raghunandan '90 toes the line with regularity, finally bulging the net after a couple of misses.

The Sand Band is making quite a run. I ask Tom if he thinks his teammates can pull it out. "No," he says, and looks back at the game. With seven seconds left, and a three-point lead, though, the Band withstands a barrage of desperation heaves and walks away with a 51-47 win.

No sooner has the court been cleared than a swarm of fresh green players begins to warm up. I ask one of them about their chances. "We should win. We're undefeated," he says with a sense of guilt. Are you guys good, then? "No. We just put together some really lame wins."

Ah, Sunday Night League!

Faculty endorses new schedule

by Linda Good

Beginning next fall, the changes proposed by the Calendar and Schedule Committee will go into effect. At the faculty meeting last Wednesday, the faculty voted to adopt the new schedule, option B of the two proposed schedules, including an amendment submitted by a group of five faculty members.

The amendment to the proposal was moved at the meeting by Professor of English Michael Bell. It upheld the Committee's decision to move the beginning of the class schedule on Tuesdays and Thursdays from 8:00 to 8:30, with a five minute reduction in time between classes.

The amendment also supported the proposal to move the beginning of afternoon classes all week from 1:00 to 1:10, except for labs, which will still begin at 1:00. The amendment's provisions, however, addressed morning classes on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays.

Without the amendment, Monday, Wednesday and Friday mornings would also begin at 8:30, with allowances for 8:00 starts wherever necessary. The number of 50-minute slots would decrease from five to four.

Those who penned the amendment, however, did not see the need for this change. Their proposal, copies of which were distributed to each member present, suggested an alternative.

Amendment affects MWF classes
"We amend your modification of the schedule for Monday, Wednesday and Friday mornings - returning these mornings to the pattern of the currently existing schedule of the day," it said.

Under the amendment, classes will begin at 8:00 to fit in the five currently existing 50-minute slots. Two 75-minute slots at 8:30 and 11:00 are also included.

"The committee proposal reduces the number of slots from five to four, which seems contrary to the committee's wish to maximize student choices and minimize conflicts," Bell said.

The amended changes will therefore not affect the number of class slots, but only starting and ending times. There will still be five 50-minute regular slots, along with nine 75-minute slots and a two and three quarter hour seminar slot on Wednesday.

Professor of Computer Science Kim Bruce, one of the authors of the amendment, raised some concern about the reduction of 50-minute morning slots.

"As a professor of three-day-a-week classes, I know that few would schedule these courses in the afternoon because we have labs in the afternoon," he said.

Professor of Economics Michael McPherson offered his own suggestions before voting took place for the proposed amended class schedule at the last week's faculty meeting. (Thomas)

"Also, intro courses and single large lectures have a lock on the morning slots so they don't conflict with each other. Smaller courses are then forced to try and find new slots or go head to head with the big lectures."

Bruce said that reduction of the number of three-day-a-week morning courses, which was part of the original proposal, would only increase the problem.

Also discussed was the problem of shorter lunches. "There will be a problem for students who have labs Tuesdays and Thursdays, but it removes the lunch crunch Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays," Professor of Music Douglas Moore, spokesperson for the Calendar and Scheduling Committee, said.

Despite these concerns, the proposed schedule passed with the amendment by a 58-24 vote.

Also at issue at the meeting was the possible inclusion of evening courses as part of the regular curriculum. The scheduling committee recommended against the proposal.

Moore cited a number of reasons for the recommendation. "While it would provide for additional one hour seminars, we've included them already in the proposed amended schedule. Interruption in the evening would be devastating to all co-curricular activities. We need to keep room for theater productions, concerts, films, etc."

Bell, however, disagreed. "I know colleagues who would like to teach at night. Theoretically, we are always teaching at night for theater majors. I think that saying that no one can use a classroom after 7:00 P.M. is a waste of a facility."

Other faculty members raised strong objections on behalf of theater majors. "I had a class in the evenings and were still trying to fulfill the requirements of their major by participating in productions. Sports and other activities often take up the afternoons leaving evenings as the only free slots for theater rehearsals."

The motion to have evening classes was passed on an experimental basis. Evening classes will be allowed provided that only elective classes and no classes required for a major be held in the evenings, and that only one night per week be used. The benefits of the decision will be assessed after two years.

Students increasingly aware of responsibilities as hosts

by Tom Dupree

Last Saturday's incident at Prospect House, in which Williamstown police allege that the four house officers furnished alcohol to minors, has sparked an increased awareness of student hosts' responsibilities in preventing non-Williams students and uninvited guests from attending Williams parties.

Barely a week after the incident, advertisements for several campus parties specified that Williams students would need to furnish college identification in order to gain entrance. Minutes of the most recent Housing Committee meeting, which were sent to all House presidents, advised, "Due to recent events with the Williamstown Police, please devise methods to check IDs at all House functions."

Assistant Dean of the College Andrew Hernandez agreed that House Presidents are now increasingly aware of the need to abide by the party plan, in which the host is required to specify the method by which he or she will prevent non-Williams students and uninvited guests from entering.

'A little lax in the past'

"House Presidents and officers may have been a little lax in the past," Hernandez said. "We are now underscoring the need to police parties by checking IDs. If a non-student is present, he will be asked to leave. This will be enforced by Williams Security, and, if necessary, by Williamstown Police."

Hernandez also emphasized his concern over off-campus parties, especially as warm weather approaches. "The police will be the first to show up at the door," he said. "We want to be both courteous and vigilant in hosting parties. Hosts should notify neighbors, as well as designate doorpeople to make sure people don't just wander in off the street."

According to Hernandez, Winter Carnival ran smoothly in part because House officers made a serious effort to check IDs and invitations at the door. "I went around to several parties - Dodd, Tyler, Currier. From what I saw, it went very well. People who looked out of place [not dressed in the required semi-formal attire] were confronted," Hernandez said, speculating that the basketball defeats of Amherst earlier in the evening had produced "a natural high," removing the temptation to drink heavily.

Hernandez said the Dean's Office had requested the College Council to draft a letter to the community reminding students of the need to be vigilant. "We have an obligation to deal with not only our standards [in hosting parties], but also with the community's standards," he said.

Gladden House president Paul Dehmel '91 said that the issue of checking IDs at the door for all future parties will soon be debated among house members. "We will definitely think about it," he said.

Perry House president Chuck Goldfarb '92 said, "I think we are going to have to check IDs at House parties." He added that the issue had not yet been formally discussed.

House parties will not be the only events to see IDs being checked at the door. Amy Huston '92, President of the Student Activities Committee, said that at all future SAC events, college ID will be required. "We decided last week, after the Prospect incident, that it was a good policy," she said. "It's a very dangerous situation. The SAC didn't want to take responsibility for people."

Huston said that last Thursday's SAC party in Mission ran smoothly. "Williams Security encouraged us to check IDs. We had people stationed at the door," she said. Still, she noted, checking IDs could present a problem if a student brings a prospective or a friend from home.

The four Prospect House officers -- President Jody Weisberg '92, Vice President Jared Cumming '92, Treasurer Peter Schneberger '92, and Secretary Phil Harris '90 -- whom police allege provided alcohol to minors all refused to comment on the incident or on the court proceedings.

The police confirmed yesterday that they have filed a criminal complaint application against the four students on the charge of furnishing alcohol to minors, but that the charges had not yet been officially filed.

Attorney Bruce Grinnell of Grinnell and Duisendorf, the firm representing the students, also declined to comment, stating that nothing is yet in the public record.

'Dean's Office is waiting'

Hernandez said that any disciplinary action taken against the students by the college would be postponed until the case is resolved in court. "In theory, we could take disciplinary action right now," he said. "But I want to emphasize that

Snail Prognosis writes parody of Observer

by Dan Silverman

The group of politically active students called Snail Prognosis produced and distributed a single-page parody of the Williams Observer last week. The parody, titled "The Williams Observer," was meant to be anonymous.

The original version of the paper, however, was intercepted by editors of the Williams Observer and staff from Central Office Services before it could be printed. Representatives of Snail Prognosis were told that their parody would not be printed by the college unless the group accredited the work to themselves.

"We are not in the business of having students use college facilities to print anonymous material," Dean of the College Stephen Fix said.

The Snail Prognosis publication made itself out to be a Williams Observer summary edition. The paper addressed some of the issues that the Observer has discussed over the year, and made fun of the problems Snail Prognosis saw with the Observer's journalistic tactics.

"These tactics include," the parody read, "feature articles probing both sides of an issue that faces America, both exhaustively and objectively, thus presenting both sides in such an obtuse manner that you could not possibly be interested enough to read them, let alone weigh both sides."

Another sample from the parody read, "In this issue, we poked gentle fun at Quayle's stupidity, thus no one can get angry at the conservative establishment for his election; we agree he's a fool." The Snail Prognosis parody was accidentally discovered before printing by Observer publisher Ashesh Shah '92 and opinions editor Ken Levy '91 who were at Central Office Services on Observer business. Shah and Levy had gone there to give an Office Services staff member material to be printed.

"He [the staff member] said, 'Oh, didn't you just give me something earlier today? Put it over there with your other stuff,'" Shah said.

Shah and Levy looked at the other material and saw that it wasn't their own. They then noticed that it had been paid for by the Snail Prognosis.

No evening classes

The bulk of the changes in the daily class schedule adopted by the faculty last Wednesday are notable only for their conservatism. Afternoon classes were moved back by 10 minutes to allow a longer lunch hour, and classes on Tuesday and Thursday mornings were delayed slightly to appease those who have trouble waking up by eight. No harm.

One of the changes, however, is quite disturbing. After much debate, the faculty voted to begin scheduling evening classes next year. This will be done on an "experimental" basis. Only elective courses will be given the evening slots, and only one night a week will be used. The program will last for two years, at which time it will be opened to debate once again.

Many professors have expressed strong support for the evening classes. This is understandable enough. Classes at night would minimize students' conflicts with other courses and free up professors' daytime hours for research and family obligations. In approving the new schedule, however, the faculty seems to have forgotten about students' concerns.

Evenings are the one time of day when students can attend lectures, concerts, performances, movies, club meetings and all such "co-curricular" activities. Last week's Weekly Calendar showed no fewer than 33 such events occurring on weeknights between 7:00 and 10:00. This does not include athletic practices or rehearsals for theater and singing groups.

Williams prides itself in offering a tremendous number and variety of extracurricular activities to its students. Prospective students are showered with sample Daily Advisers and Weekly Calendars. What is the sense of preventing students from attending so many of these events just to gain an extra class hour?

A class that meets at night might make life easier for the professor. For the twenty or so students involved, however, it makes life much more difficult. One is missing crew practice, one is missing a movie for English class, one is being forced to arrive late to orchestra rehearsal, one is missing a speech by a famous politician. Apparently, the faculty feels that all this is quite acceptable.

To students, however, it is intolerable. There are more than enough class hours in the day. The 8:00 and 12:00 hours on Monday, Wednesday and Friday are scarcely used at all. The 2:30 slot on Tuesday and Friday is also underused. Merely enforcing the requirement that departments distribute their classes evenly among the existing time slots would more than suffice to cut down conflicts between classes. We simply do not need more time slots, the sole advantage that evening classes offer.

Adopting the program on an experimental basis is only a way for the faculty to foist it off on students while minimizing negative reactions. It's difficult to argue with someone who can respond by saying, "We're just giving it a fair chance. Play along and see how it works."

Two years is a long time to give something a chance. Faculty and students alike know how much evening classes will inconvenience rehearsals and activities. That's no mystery. Professor of English Michael Bell defended the program by saying, "I know colleagues who would like to teach at night." Surely there are a good many more students who shudder at the thought of taking classes at night.

Despite the faculty's rhetoric, evening classes are not a noble experiment. They are a dangerous anomaly with no place at Williams. Let's forget the two-year experiment keep our classes during the daylight hours.

"The good news is, there's private property now in the U.S.S.R. The bad news is, we own it!"

Letters

College ought to publish plant letters

To the editor:

At a recent public hearing regarding the absurd proposal by the Meridian Power Corp. of Boston to build a leviathan power plant in the village beautiful, Meridian's vice president of business and development, William Harper, stated that "all that had to be done to get this project underway was a phone call and a letter to Williams College." Ah yes, very open and democratic indeed.

Harper stated that Meridian has an agreement with Williams College to purchase some of the steam which the proposed plant would generate. In the past, Williams officials have stated that no such agreement exists. Clearly, someone is lying. If such an agreement DOES exist, as Harper stated it does, then clearly Williams College is sanctioning a ludicrous and environmentally abhorred project.

So, my request is simple. In the next edition of the Record, I would like the Williams administration to publish any letters it may have received from Meridian regarding agreements or plans for the proposed plant. As students and town residents, we have a right to this information.

Failure by the administration to respond to this request will be seen in a negative light by those of us opposed to the power plant idea.

Alum enjoys teaching for Winter Study

To the editor:

I am responding to the editorial entitled "Why Winter Study must stay" [January 16].

As an alumnus, I feel particularly fortunate to have been asked to return to Alma Mater to teach my Winter Study course in photography for three of the past four years. A classroom here in Rochester, NY, told me last summer, "You have a rare privilege. Most alums get to see the college only at reunions. You are able to see it in action and participate in that action."

It is difficult for me to know whether I am at an advantage or a disadvantage during WSP in not being a regular member of the faculty. Perhaps I have had in work a little harder to let my students know that I take my responsibility seriously, and that I expect them to do the same. I do know that about 95 percent of my students have tackled their darkroom work with enthusiasm and excitement. Many of them have shared these feelings with me personally. A few have expressed in the introductions to their portfolios this excitement and their appreciation for having had the opportunity to learn, in three short weeks, skills they will carry with them for life.

Granted, Winter Study is a break from the demands of the normal course load. I see it, however, as a break not in degree or intensity, but in kind. One gets out of college, and this includes Winter Study, no more than the effort that one puts into it. The vast majority of students were not only willing, but eager, to put forth that effort. Not a small number asked for darkroom time mornings, evenings, and, yes, Sundays, as early as 9:00 a.m. And when I, too, succumbed to the flu this year, these same students were the first to say, "We know what to do and how to do it now. You go back to your room and rest!"

A wonderful group of men and women! Can you wonder why, even with the long day I must put in, I eagerly look forward each year to yet another Winter Study?

Don't ban high schoolers from parties

To the editor:

Any attempt to bar local youths from attending college functions must be regarded as an unforgivable exercise of elitist privilege, a materialistic "apartheid" if you will.

The college's drinking policy has long existed as a strange paradox. Yes, contemporary conservatives have to walk a thin line when trying (in vain) to justify their beliefs.

On the one hand, conservatives spout forth, tongue-in-cheek, their rigid moral standards. No alcohol! No drugs! I won't

Clarification

There was some ambiguity in the use of the word "charged" in last week's story "Four students charged at Prospect party" and the accompanying editorial. Although a Williamstown police officer informed the Record reporter that the Prospect house officers had been charged with furnishing alcohol to minors, the correct term should have been "criminal complaints are being sought" against the students. According to Officer Vincent Zito, Jr., the students have the opportunity to persuade a magistrate that the charges were unwarranted and should not be filed. Zito told the Record yesterday that the terms "charged" and "seeking criminal complaints" are often used interchangeably and are "practically the same thing." We regret any misunderstanding that may have ensued.

at this point enter into a discussion of how these same folks rarely inhabit the moral systems they espouse. We must keep our youths clean!

But on the other hand, there is that long-time college-yuppie-clitist tradition of a good ol' drink with the boys.

But I am not concerned with the drinking policy as such, but rather its implications on town-gown relations. Underage people drink at Williams College. That's no secret. If the college attempts to prevent town youths from attending parties (at which they may or may not drink), then it will be implementing an unforgivable system of supra-legal social elitism.

"Yes, pay big bucks and come here, and we can buy off the local authorities. But if you are a mere 'townie' then, hey, you'll be busted."

Whatever policy the college decides to adopt, it had better be consistent. Citizens are equal in the eyes of the law (allegedly, allegedly). If Williams evokes its "legal" right to keep unwanted, non-student guests off the campus, then it cannot, at the same time, sanction an "illegal" activity (underage drinking). If they do this, however, then they will have clearly subverted their principal foundation, and town youths will be fully justified in all future transgressions of the college's "private property."

Most of my friends are "townies." Believe me, town-gown relations are already strained pretty tightly. Town youths already feel excluded and they resent being treated like scum by "yuppie-outside-ers." If the college bars them from campus functions because of their status as "mere" townspersons, then things will only get worse...much worse.

Smith College

Employees of the Smith College bookstore discovered the difference between good manners and good morals when a woman claiming that she just wanted enough money to pay her rent threatened employees with a toy cap pistol, then suspected the gun was real, but could not be sure at the time. A suspect was arrested later after one of the employees identified her from a police composite sketch and remembered her as a temporary employee of the bookstore. It was immediately obvious that the robbery was an inside job, according to the Smith College Director of Security. "She was absolutely desperate and wasn't going to go into a Seven-Eleven or a Cumberland Farms and rob them," the director said. After the incident, the suspect was ashamed and embarrassed by her actions, according to her lawyer, but the "armed robbery while masked" charge carries a mandatory minimum of five years in jail.

Tufts University

Eight students who silently protested the Catholic Church's stand on homosexual activity during a Mass will receive written warnings, but no other disciplinary action will be taken, according to the Dean of Students. The students, wearing black T-shirts that stated "Silence=Death," held hands and silently sat in the congregation was invited to take communion. One of the protesters explained homosexual activity to participate in communion. "By remaining silent throughout the service, we symbolized the Church's silence on the issues of AIDS, condom use and the violence against gays, lesbians and bisexuals," read a public statement by the group. The college chaplain informed the dean, saying that it was his responsibility to see that students be able to worship freely without disruption. The university president later issued a statement that said that "interfering in any way with a religious service is a violation of basic human rights which will not be tolerated at Tufts."

Wesleyan University

College President William Chace gave a written response in participants in last month's protest by African-Americans in the admissions office. The students had taken over the office in the unsuccessful attempt to present a list of demands to a meeting of the president and the Board of Trustees. At the time, protest participants had felt that the board was unconcerned about issues that the group felt was important, and were disappointed with the lack of communication that was possible. Now that the president has provided a point-by-point reply, one of the protesters said that "the lines of communication are not totally destroyed at this point." However, he still felt that their demand for "detailed responses, complete with statistics, progress reports, proposals and timeframes," has not been met. "(Chace) supplied us with no more than his usual bureaucratic rhetoric, and he certainly didn't provide any creative solutions," the protester said.

College students or kindergartners? Vandalism went out with pre-school

by Ann Mantil

"Share everything. Play fair...Don't take things that aren't yours." From Robert Fulghum's All I Ever Needed to Know I Learned in Kindergarten.

Strange, but kindergarten must have changed since Fulghum's day. Or maybe Williams students have just lost sight of the basic morals we were supposed to have learned when we were there. I don't think, for example, that after last week anyone here can argue that we respect each other. Five-year-olds know it's wrong to go around ripping down each other's pictures and smashing glass that keeps pictures from being ripped down.

Then why don't we??

A friend of mine spent a good part of an evening last week making some posters and flyers to advertise the Peer Health condomgrams sold last week for Valentine's Day. Most people I know took the condomgrams as something of a joke, but she believed that the concept stood for something deeper: the promotion of safe sex. So she worked with stencils and colored paper and posterboard to try to get the campus to buy into her idea, her cause.

When she finished, she went and hung the signs in prominent places in Baxter mailroom. That was around eight or nine in the evening. The next morning, every single sign was gone.

The janitors insist that they were not responsible. In their support, other signs advertising condomgrams which had been put up in Sawyer vanished that night as well.

That same week, the glass in the BGLU display case in Baxter was smashed. It has happened before and elicited little or no reaction from the student body, much less the administration. The question I am asking is why.

The suggestion I am going to make in this article has been made before, and met with no response. So I urge the administration of this college to please pay particular attention to this part, even if you have been unmoved by the incidents which I have related.

Please don't let this vandalism pass in silence. Please don't send out letters to houses, presidents, JAs and other campus leaders, asking them to emphasize the need to respect one another, like you did when the last version of this column appeared in the Record. It's ridiculous.

Their signs are the ones being ripped down. It's time for you to do something. It's time for you to recognize publicly that the way students are treating each other's views is completely unacceptable. It's time for you to state unequivocally that serious disciplinary action will be taken if anyone is found ripping down signs, glass, or sabotaging Daily Adviser messages, or otherwise infringing upon other students' rights to express themselves.

The only reference last week to the broken display case came in the form of a letter to the Record from John Vincent. He thanked the unknown vandal for breaking the silence which had previously characterized the homophobia on this campus. "You have inadvertently opened up a discourse which will inevitably call attention to invisible, and dangerously ubiquitous, silent bigotry."

But where is the discourse? The silence continues. There is no controversy, no response, not even from the administration.

Williams students are getting sick of being called apathetic. I am too. But I would argue that apathy has reached truly sickening levels when we do not even defend the rights of those who do care, who are not apathetic, to express themselves. The administration has made a consensus decision to foster that apathy when it allows vandalism to pass unchallenged. The student body is only proving its critics to be right in their allegations.

The only reason I can think of for the administration's silence is that perhaps they feel the vandalism is not their fault, and not their responsibility to stop. Why do writers keep attacking college officials and not the people who are ripping down the signs in the first place?

The answer is that we're not in kindergarten anymore. There are students here who have forgotten that vandalism is unacceptable, and those students are certainly not going to be affected by an editorial when the administration is silently condoning their actions. Somebody has to put the problem in terms that the vandals can understand.

Put it in kindergarten terms: If you do something that's wrong, you will be punished. We get punished for cheating and stealing and not doing our work. All I'm asking is that not respecting others be added to the list of offenses that are considered worthy of punishment.

What do you think of the actions taken against the Prospect House officers?

"It makes me nervous that people on campus would be responsible for that." --Danielle Boyd '91.

"It's a great argument for not becoming a house officer." --Jeff Merritt '93.

"We like the idea of checking Williams IDs at parties, but don't think house presidents should be made responsible for everyone at the party." --John Case '93, Jon Nasser '93 and Robert van Gent '93.

"I think it's a shame that it happened but it's more security's responsibility than the house presidents'." --Zoe Rhodes '92.

"They should not be used as scapegoats for the administration's flawed policies." --Dave Carlson '91.

Currier Club evokes images of Roaring Twenties jazz club

by Keith Hedlund

With a selection of hard-swinging jazz, white linen tablecloths, and tuxedoed hostesses, the "Currier Club" returned to Williams February 9th and 10th after a two-year absence. The semi-formal affair entertained students in the Currier Ballroom under the guise of a 1920's jazz club.

"It was boring," Damian Williams '91, organizer of this year's club, said. "This gave me something to do and provided a good time for a lot of people. The Williams campus needs more creative alternatives to the traditional party."

The sounds of trumpet and saxophone improvisation and vocalists jamming with the band waked up the stairway to greet guests. After proceeding past the large bouncer guarding the doorway, guests entering the ballroom were plunged into the atmosphere of a different era, complete with white candles flickering on cocktail tables and a spread of bric, red grapes, crackers and sparkling apple cider. The club kept its doors opened from nine until one. The bouncer let in guests who had made reservations, and a bouncer led them to their seats. Each night at least one person was denied reservations because of a lack of space. Reservations cost three dollars.

Most of the songs the band played were at least derivatives of jazz classics, including "Night in Tunisia" and an avant-garde presentation of "Autumn Leaves." Among the vocal numbers were a blues-like rendition of "Summertime" by Abbygail Dinsion '92 and an upbeat "A Train" by Angelique Feaster '92. In addition, Gregory Woods '91 gave a soulful interpretation of "You Are My Sunshine" and Elizabeth Rogers '91 sang "Don't Get Around Much Anymore."

Students who attended the club were enthusiastic. "It provided a classy alternative to the traditional college party, but at the same time the atmosphere was overwhelmingly casual," Mark Sutton '92, the band's trumpet player, said.

Students besides Sutton also agreed with Williams that the Currier Club could be one answer to a seemingly growing desire among Williams students for social alternatives to traditional parties.

"It made a really good alternative to the regular band and dance parties," Ash

Bali '93 said. "It didn't have the qualities of either, and it attracted a different crowd."

"I also thought the music was great. I really hope that people give more funding to the club," she continued. "I think it was worth a lot more than we paid. Damian deserves a lot of credit for organizing it, and I plan to support whatever he does with it in the future."

"There should be more of that sort of thing on campus. I wish it were a regular event," Mark Knell '91 said.

According to Williams, that won't happen. "Things like this lose their flare once they become routine," he said. He added that the Currier Club might be a part of the BSU's Malcolm X Day activities next week, and he may also organize one or two more clubs in the spring, but probably no more than that.

"The biggest problem was money," he said. "Hopefully after this performance people will be a bit more receptive to funding it. It was also a pain in the butt that someone stole all of our candles after the first show."

The seven band members included John Davenport '92 on tenor saxophone, Fred Geiersbach '90 on flute, Win Goodbody '90 on drums, Caleb Gindon '91 on trombone, Jason Howland '93 on piano, Chris Lightner '93 on bass and Sutton.

The event was sponsored in part by the Theatre Club, Cap and Bells, College Council and the Student Activities Committee.

"Momentum is shifting." "The momentum is shifting," Bennett said. "The scourge is beginning to end." Recent studies suggest that the "scourge" has been diminishing for several years. Researchers at the University of Michigan, who annually report on drug use among high school seniors, found that the number of college students using illicit drugs has been steadily declining. In 1986, 40.9 percent of collegians said they'd used marijuana during the prior year. In 1988, the figure was down to 34.6 percent. For cocaine, 17.1 percent said in 1986 they'd used it in the past year. In 1988, 10 percent reported cocaine use in the last year.

Bennett still had harsh words for higher education during a December 11, 1989, speech at Harvard, where he accused scholars—notably Princeton University researcher Ednan Nadelmann—of underestimating the war on drugs by suggesting the best way to win the war is to legalize drugs.

Academic officials reply that Bennett's plan simply can't work because it requires that unlikely people educators and administrators act like a national drug police force.

"We feel better because we've required [students to sign a pledge]," Martin said, "but that doesn't mean the mechanism is working."

"Then we could have more freedom to do what we want," Cnaan said. Although Shah said he appreciated the parody of the Observer he suggested criticisms like that are better when they are attributed to someone.

"If you want to say something, have the balls to say it," Shah said.

Anonymous parody made by student activist group

Uncertain about the college's policy for printing anonymous material, or whether the use in this manner of the Observer's name violated any copyright laws, Shah and Levy brought the parody to the attention of the Dean's Office.

Fix confirmed that the parody would have to be attributed in some way to Snail Prognosis if the college were to print it. According to Fix, the subject of copyright laws did not come up in the conversation.

Fix and the Williams Observer staff saw no other problems with the publication of the Snail Prognosis paper. "I thought it was funny," Shah said. "I was also flattered because everyone knows parody is the most sincere form of flattery."

Brian Cnaan, founder of Snail Prognosis, said he was not pleased with the way his group's efforts were treated. "The head of Office Services [Ron Favreau] has never been very helpful to us," Cnaan said. "He has always given us sort of a hard time."

Cnaan said that in the future Snail Prognosis might produce another mock Williams Observer but would consider having it printed somewhere where the group wouldn't have to use college facilities.

"Then we could have more freedom to do what we want," Cnaan said. Although Shah said he appreciated the parody of the Observer he suggested criticisms like that are better when they are attributed to someone.

"If you want to say something, have the balls to say it," Shah said.

De Klerk's reforms still not enough

College Press Service

Anti-apartheid activists on U.S. campuses say they're elated by South African President F.W. de Klerk's sweeping reforms, but still maintain that students should keep the pressure on their schools to avoid indirect economic support of the South African government for now.

"This is a very big victory for the people of South Africa and the international anti-apartheid movement," Richard Knight of the Africa Fund said. The fund is a New York-based group that has coordinated much of the anti-apartheid activity on American campuses for 20 years.

De Klerk legalized the long-outlawed African National Congress and other anti-apartheid groups, partially lifted the 43-month old "state of emergency" and called for negotiations to end apartheid and give the voiceless black majority a voice in South Africa's government.

On February 11, de Klerk released ANC leader Nelson Mandela, imprisoned since 1962.

Still, under emergency regulations that remain in effect, the government can detain anyone for as long as six months without charge. Police have wide powers to ban meetings or speeches, and to restrict media coverage of their own actions in dealing with political unrest.

The segregationist apartheid system that denies black citizens most property and human rights has always provoked passionate opposition on U.S. campuses. Students have successfully convinced administrations at scores of colleges to sell off shares in firms that conduct business in South Africa.

"All those students who sat in buildings and shanties," Knight said, "this is their victory too."

Knight hoped students would continue to pressure their schools and communities to divest until black South Africans win all their rights. "This is not the end of apartheid by any means. There are more changes coming, but it's important that we continue pushing."

South African Archbishop Desmond Tutu also called for a continued divestment campaign during a Feb. 4 news conference at Harvard University, where he attended a private meeting of the school's governing Board of Overseers.

Tutu was elected last year to the post as part of a drive to pressure the university into ridding itself of all investments in companies doing business in or with South Africa.

Meridian scraps plans for plant

by Keith Hedlund

Meridian Power Corporation has decided not to build the $85-million cogeneration plant it had planned to erect in Williamstown, the Berkshire Eagle reported on Friday. The company will continue its search for other potential sites in Northern Berkshire County, and Williams College will remain one of the potential purchasers of steam from the Boston-based power company.

Company officials made the announcement last Thursday, three days after over 150 Williamstown residents, gathered on a public meeting on the project, protested the plan to build the plant on town-owned land. Many townspeople had been concerned about the environmental impact of the plant.

Town Manager Steven Ledoux declined to elaborate on the decision. "I really don't want to comment on it. It happened and it's all over," he said.

In an interview last Thursday with the Berkshire Eagle, however, Ledoux said he was not surprised at Meridian's decision, considering the fervent reaction of some of the townspeople against the town Board of Selectmen for even considering the corporation's proposal. He said Williamstown could have benefited from the tax revenues but that the town will manage without the plant.

Meridian had proposed building the plant near Williamstown's landfill and Hopkins Forest. The plant would burn natural gas to generate electricity which could be sold to local utility companies. The steam by-product could be sold as a heat source, and Williams is still an interested buyer.

"We didn't have a formal agreement with Meridian before, so this shouldn't change things," college News Director Ellen Berek said.

Meridian spokesperson Thelma Schlesinger said in an interview February 16 with the Eagle that the town's resistance to the plant was a factor in Meridian's decision to look elsewhere but that the company also found sites they considered to be more advantageous.

Meridian is now looking at possible sites in the Northern Berkshires, including some in North Adams. Schlesinger said the former sewage treatment plant off State Road and the land just south of Harriman-West Airport are two of the potential sites.

Due to President's Day weekend, Meridian officials were unavailable for comment.

no disciplinary action proceedings have begun, that the Dean's Office is waiting. We will investigate the circumstances surrounding the incident before we take action, if any."

Were teens already intoxicated? Several Williams students who attended the Prospect House late night party said that the presumed high school students, who were later questioned by Williamstown Police, had arrived at the party already intoxicated. In addition, they said the keg was empty by the time the youths arrived, and that the youths had brought their own beer.

Although no date has been set, the case will probably be heard by the clerk magistrate in a show cause hearing, in order to determine if there is enough evidence for a criminal complaint to be issued. Northern Berkshire District Court personnel said the students involved would be informed by mail if and when a hearing date is set.

The Red Cross collected 249 units of blood during last week's two day drive, held in the First Congregational Church of Williamstown February 13 and 14. Along with 21 faculty and staff members, 193 Williams students donated. Local residents rounded out the number of people who gave blood.

One-gallon pins were awarded to Charles Tilford '91 and Andy Saunders '90, representing total donations of over one gallon of blood.

Donors were nourished by tuna sandwiches provided by The Village Market and Hepburn's Donuts, and upon leaving received chocolate Valentine kisses from the Red Cross.

Track teams get psyched for New England's; both perform well during week

by Josh Brumberg

After two successful meets at home, the Williams runners left the cozy confines of the Purple Valley to compete against the stiffest competition they have faced to date. The team, with next week's New England in its sights, followed the Mohawk trail, with the women getting off in Northampton to compete at an open meet at Smith. The men drove onward to Lewiston, Maine to compete in Division III New England Championships at Bates College.

In a field that included some solid Division I competition, the Williams women once again showed how powerful they are. Helene Wilburn '93 kicked things off by running away from the field in the 500m to qualify for ECACs. Seen to follow was a sizzling performance in the 4x200m relay, as co-captain Allison Smith '90, Kira Shields '91, Allison Orsi '93 and Kim Bamdollar '91 raced around the track in a new school record of 1:51.52.

In the 1500m, Anne Platt '91 cut over four full seconds off last week's field house record to qualify for nationals in a time of 4:41.31, and Ann Dannbauer '90 followed Platt home in fourth place. In the 400m, Smith, still running on a stress-fractured right foot, came home in a personal-best 1:01.35. Bamdollar only added to the fireworks as she ran a scorching 1:31.15 in the 600yd.

Not to be upstaged, co-captain Susan Gray '90 finished second in the 800m. Shields ran a personal best in the 200m to qualify for ECACs. Hilary Cairns '92 once again ran away from the field in the 3000m to win the race and qualify for nationals.

The final event of the day was the 4x800m, as Bamdollar, Gray, Cherie Macauley '92 and Platt won and qualified for Division I New England. The ever quotable Smith summed up the day: "All in all it was pretty amazing -- a great day."

In what men's captain Dale Johnson '90 described as a great meet, the men wound up with a strong fifth place at Division III New England. Highlights included Geoffrey Igharo '90 winning the triple jump in a monumental leap of 46' 11", and freshman David Wahl following with a strong sixth. John Walker '90 set sail from the board on the long jump runway and did not come down for another 22' 6" to take second place. "Because of the stiff competition, some

Editor's note: the omission was indeed unintentional; we apologize for the oversight and hope that Becca and her teammates keep on rolling as they enter the ECACs.

Men down Cardinals, ready for postseason

by Rhonda Goodman

As both the men's and women's varsity basketball teams won their games against the Defectors from Amherst on Saturday, the men's squash team enjoyed a victory of its own, defeating rival Wesleyan 8-1. The Ephs captured the Little Three championship for the eighteenth consecutive year and finished the regular season at 11-8.

The absence of senior captain John Bierbauer '90, out with a hip injury, and Zia Mahmood '90, out because of a-demie workload, did not hamper the team. The Ephs won in two ways: 3-0 and 3-2. First seed Bruce Hopper '92, second seed Andy Clayton '93 and third seed Chris Pentz '91 all won their matches easily in three relatively unexciting games each.

Rub Illig '91, playing in the fourth spot, needed five games before winning his match. He won the first game decisively, but lost the second game in a tiebreaker. But Illig bounced back to win the third game 15-10, only to lose a close fourth game, 15-13. He didn't let the fifth game get away from him, though, as he pulled away from his opponent when the score

50 percent from beyond the three point line. "I had trouble concentrating and I wasn't getting it together," he said. "I'm very used to the blue balls [the length carries further] and they were using the green balls. He stayed in the front court and cut off all of the balls." Sixth and seventh seeds Steve Buxbaum '90 and Henry Woo '91 also won their matches in three games, but by narrow margins. Buxbaum's final was 17-16, 17-14, 15-14. Woo's was 15-10, 16-14, 15-14.

Matt Tarses '90 and Chip Becker '92, playing the eighth and ninth spots, won their matches 3-0 and 3-2. Becker had a little trouble handling his opponent, but came back after losing the third and fourth games to claim the victory. Don MacKinnon '90 rounded out the Eph victory by defeating his opponent in three straight.

Next weekend the Ephs will compete in the NISRA Tournament. With the Ephmen holding their largest lead of the night at 51-36 in the second half, the Bantams made a small run, keyed by six points from Stubbs and the pair of three-point bombs. With the lead down to six, Jones scored on a fast break off a pass from Major to cut the Bantams' momentum.

Dave Bakken steers through traffic in Friday's 5-3 loss. The Ephmen stand at 7-12-2 after the loss. (Thomas)

Powerhouse teams of Middlebury and Hamilton control Ephs

by Kevin Greenberg

Tomorrow night the Williams hockey team will face Salem State at Lansing-Chapman Rink in an attempt to finish a sub-par season on a high note.

"Most of the guys, especially me, will go in and give it all we can to try to pull off a win to end the season," said senior goaltender Sean Ford.

Before the season, the Ephs believed that they had a good chance to make the playoffs. But that chance vanished early.

Men's hockey

as the team lost its first four league games on its way to a 7-12-2 record at this late stage of the season.

Both teams that defeated the Ephs last week, however, are headed to the playoffs. Middlebury, at 18-2-1, is one of the leaders in the ECAC and is nationally ranked, while Hamilton is in seventh place in the ECAC and in line for the final playoff spot.

So the role of spoiler was all that was left for Williams entering the week, but it was a slipper that did not fit the feet of the Ephmen.

"If we had beaten Hamilton they would have been out of the playoffs. If we would have been a big game for us," said defenceman David Frechette '93.

But the Ephs could not get past the Continentals. After a strong effort in the first two periods, the Williams icemen played poorly defensively in the final stanza and lost 5-2.

"That was our best first period of the year, but we missed a lot of open nets. Then we fell apart in the third period, and that's unusual since we've been a good third period team all year," Frechette said. "We played a little sloppy, and our d-zone coverage was not as tight as it could have been."

But the deadlock was short-lived, as Cochran scored on the power play from the top of the right circle just 34 seconds later. Mark Alcinder and Kent Hughes were credited with assists on the goal.

But Middlebury was not done for the period. The Panthers came down the ice with a three-on-two break, and Tim Craig took a crossing pass from Alcinder and beat Ford high with just 43 seconds remaining.

A lopsided period
The 3-1 score was barely indicative of the period, as Middlebury outshot Williams 15-7 and got 10 good scoring opportunities to four for the Ephs.

But the Ephs got the first four good scoring chances of the second period, and center Ron Van Belle '90 converted the last of them for a goal. With two puck bounced just out of reach of his outstretched body to Middlebury wing Doug Cochran. Two quick passes got the puck to Tieggen Fryberger in front who fired it past Ford with 5:39 remaining in the period.

Williams got back into the game 1:30 later with the Panthers on a power play. Middlebury goaltender Brent Tuchen mishandled the puck behind his own net and Williams wing Andrew Zimman '92 tucked it into the empty net for a short-handed goal.

But the deadlock was short-lived, as Cochran scored on the power play from the top of the right circle just 34 seconds later. Mark Alcinder and Kent Hughes were credited with assists on the goal.

But the Ephs got the first four good scoring chances of the second period, and center Ron Van Belle '90 converted the last of them for a goal. With two seconds remaining in a five-on-three Williams power play, Laferrere dished the puck to Sean Segoin '91. Seguin sent a crossing pass to Van Belle, who scored with 10:04 remaining in the period.

But then Middlebury roared back to life, scoring twice in five minutes during separate four-on-four situations.

Alcinder scored the first Panther goal with 8:04 to play off a pass from Frank Clemens. Then, with 3:24 remaining, Clemens controlled the puck behind the net and sent it in front to Jamie Noll who gave Middlebury a 5-2 lead.

Williams almost closed the gap in the period's final minute, but a shot by Jim Jasinski '93 was blocked by Tuchen and then Van Belle was stopped twice by the Panther goalie.

Middlebury outskated the Ephs in the final stanza, getting 12 good opportunities on Ford, to only four strong chances for the home team. The Ephs converted one of those chances just before the buzzer, as Van Belle scored with five seconds remaining with assists from Mike Polonski '92 and Dave Bakken '90.

"We played well at the beginning of each period," said Frechette. "I don't know if we ran out of gas or what."

The Ephmen will attempt to fill up their tanks before tomorrow night at 7:30.

J. V. squash crushes Amherst, eyes season finale

by John Bugbee

The men's junior varsity squash team, after a three-week stretch that saw them play only one match, crushed Amherst two Saturdays ago at Williams' Lasell squash courts. To those following the J.V. squad's story, it will come as no surprise that this win was coupled with a loss at Trinity on the preceding Wednesday. The two matches update the team's month-old .500 record to 5-5.

The team's inability to pull ahead of the break-even mark did not seem to detract from their jubilation at the end of Amherst, though. Indeed, the J.V. Ephmen seem on the whole quite happy with their performance to date.

So does coach Dave Johnson, who said, "The J.V. has been doing a great job lately -- against Trinity, too. Trinity's lineup was almost all experienced upperclassmen, and some of our sophomores had great matches out there."

Those great matches proved not enough, though, as Williams fell to Trinity 4-3. The match actually went harder for the Ephs than the numbers indicate, though; two of their three wins came when first- and second-seeds Matt Tarses '90 and Chip Becker '92 repeated against Trinity's sixth- and seventh-ranked players.

The only Eph victory over Trinity's top five positions went to Becker, who downed his second-seeded opponent 3-0. It should be noted, though, that the Williams squad is traveling without its third through sixth seeds, so that seventh-ranked Steve Simpson '92 moved up to the number three slot. Had the four missing Ephs come along, the squad would undoubtedly have fared better.

The full J.V. squad did turn out for the Amherst match, with fearsome results. The Lord left proved no contest for the Ephmen in most matches; seven Williams players dispatched their opponents in three straight games. Amherst managed to win only six of the thirty-four games that were played in the course of their 9-1 routing.

In fact, the Amherst squad's only win came when their sixth-seeded player repeated against Eph ninth seed Jun Hu Son '92. Even against this higher-ranked opponent, Son grabbed one game before his defeat.

By far the most dramatic Eph win came at the tenth rung on the ladder, where Hugh Howards '92 battled back to a 3-2 victory after losing his first two games.

The match was full of tense moments, as when Howards called for a no-set debreaker in the second game, which was tied at fourteen all. This call indicates that the winner of the next point is awarded the game. Unfortunately, Howards lost the point.

His fortunes turned in the next two games, though. Finding himself playing a fifth game for the match, Howards began by winning the first point with the much-maligned double-backshot. "He went on to take the game 15-10."

The junior varsity men, having rounded out their official schedule with a match at Wesleyan this past weekend, will end the season by competing against sundy faculty members in a match sometime this week.

Owners Lock Out Baseball Players

Major league baseball owners locked the players out of spring training camps in Florida on February 16, as a labor dispute sent waves of disappointment rippling throughout the baseball community. The players want to maintain the same agreement now in effect, with trainer changes, while the owners fear instituting a salary cap and a pay scale for entering players. Meanwhile, several players of note, including Jose Canseco, who will receive $2 million this year, Mark McGwire and John Cerutti, signed with their 1989 clubs.

NFL in Draft College Juniors

In an effort to maintain the integrity of the college draft, NFL Commissioner Paul Tagliabue has allowed any college player who entered school for the fall of 1987 to be eligible for the draft. Over 50 college underclassmen, including West Virginia quarterback Major Harris, have expressed a desire to be considered by the NFL, a fact that should have major consequences for the upcoming draft.

Lemieux and Bird see streaks end

Pittsburgh Penguin center Mario Lemieux and Boston Celtic Larry Bird, thrust into the national sports spotlight of late because of significant streaks, saw those streaks come to an end last week. Lemieux, who had scored a point in 47 consecutive games and appeared within reach of Wayne Gretzky's record of 51 games, failed to score in a 4-3 win over the Rangers as a bad luck limited him to three shifts. Bird, chasing Calvin Murphy's NBA mark of 79 consecutive free throws made, missed from the line against Houston, ending his streak at 71.

WHAT YOU GET TO HELP YOU RECYCLE:

- * Another trash can in your room/office for your recycleable paper.
- * Big yellow and white trash cans in your dorm/building for bottles and cans.
- * A reminder from your custodian (if you forget to sort your trash).
- * You have to supply your own recycleables, though.

HOW TO USE THEM:

- * Your new trash can can take: cardboard, colored paper, non-windowed envelopes, labels, stamps, and an occasional staple.
- * Do not give it: photographs, used tissues or paper towels, carbon and pressure sensitive paper, spiral binders, newspaper, cans, bottles or small mammals.

DON'T FORGET:

- * To rinse your cans and bottles before you recycle them.
- * To keep using the good old newspaper racks. This makes things easier on the custodians.
- * That this new program is mandatory.
- * That recycling is to benefit someone, and that someone is you.

Skaters end campaign with strong road outings

by Kathleen Lapey

The 1989-90 version of the Williams skaters' hockey team took its show on the road for the last time this past week, ending in a 1-1 tie against Wesleyan and a 2-2 defeat in a very strong showing against a tough Division I Brown squad. On Saturday, the skaters traveled to Wesleyan to seek revenge on the Cardinals, who had handed the Ephs women a 3-1 loss earlier this season. The contest that followed was perhaps the roughest, most lary Klotz '90 led the puck again and again, erasing the Cardinal power play and frustrating Wesleyan even further. During the second period, the Eph offense became a much more imposing force. The enraged home team reacted with controversial hooking, roughing and checking which went unnoticed by the confused referees. The squad was not distracted, however, and continued to play its own game.

exciting game of the season. Both teams went into the first period with equal enthusiasm and determination, and it was clear from the start that it would be a close game.

Although Wesleyan scored first, Williams did not let up and became even more determined to conquer the dirty, violent Cardinals. Williams coach Jim Briggs' defense was particularly strong, as tri-captain Kristin Moorman '90 and Tamiko Kido '92 continually thwarted all attempts of the Cardinals. During Williams' one penalty, defenseman Hi-

A picture perfect goal The lone Williams goal was scored on a rather impressive offensive sequence started by Sharon McGee '93. She sent the puck behind the net to tri-captain Jill Magnuson '90 who slid it in front of the net to tri-captain Kara Lynch '90. Lynch ripped the cords with a quick wrist shot, knotting the game at 1-1. By the third period, the healthy enthusiasm of both teams had turned into bitter aggression and hostility. When Williams forwards Tierney Sage '92 and Holly Christoferson '92 continued to forecheck relentlessly and McGee provided some thrilling breakaways, Wesleyan responded with illegal slashing and hooking. Despite such heightened intensity, the contest was still deadlocked by the end of the third period. The teams skated fiercely during the five minute overtime, but neither squad was able to score the decisive goal. Coaches Briggs and Lapey were quite content with the tie, as it had been the team's finest effort of the season. Perhaps the bravest performance of the day came from Magnuson, as her injury in a car accident did not affect her intensity on the ice at all. However, the most valuable player was clearly Williams goalie Sue Piecher '90, who frustrated the Cardinals repeatedly with a personal record 46 saves.

Earlier in the week, Williams travelled to Providence and took on Division I Brown. The close 4-2 loss was also a victory for the Ephs women, as they had not expected to come as close to the more experienced and talented Brown team. Williams spent much of the game on the defensive, but they held their own impressively and were not intimidated by Brown's superior stick handling and passing.

The Ephs women even drew first blood in the game, as Lynch tallied in the first period with an assist from Sage. But Brown quickly took over the offensive flow of the game, outshooting Williams

45-3 and coming up with a two-goal victory. The offensive attempts of the Ephs were minimal, but their backchecking and defensive play in front of the net were admirable. Particularly strong in this respect were sophomores Valerie Granfield and Alex Page. Also noteworthy was the great hustle of rookies Nina Coslov '93 and Lela Means '93, who matched their more experienced Division I rivals stride for stride.

The much improved Williams squad will lose six seniors: tri-captains Lynch, Moorman, and Magnuson, goalie Piecher, defenseman Klotz, and wing Katie Lapey. Also departing are coaches Briggs and Lapey, whose guidance and support have been vital to the squad.

Sophomores Kido, Sage, Christoferson, Page, Granfield and Lenke Wood should be able to fill the holes left by the departing seniors, and the varsity can also draw upon the increasingly large rookie squad for additional support. While goalie Piecher has been an invaluable member of the club and the anchor of the defense, freshman goalie Alecia Novitski has the poise and ability to perform just as admirably in the Williams nets.

Women defeat Amherst and Trinity, face Tufts on Saturday

by Asli Bali

As early crowds filed into Chandler gym on Saturday in anticipation of the men's hoops battle against Amherst, the eager spectators were witness to another showdown as the women's teams' power brand of basketball stuffed the Lord Jeffs with a vengeance. The 58-44 win, coupled with a win earlier in the week against Trinity, left the women proud owners of a 9-8 mark as they head into the final weeks of the 1989-90 campaign. Saturday's game started off fast from the tipoff. There was a substantial Amherst crowd at Chandler, and they were mandating a tough performance from their belts and Williams tried to translate its home court advantage into a difference on the scoreboard. There were two games going on, the basketball game which the Ephs were clearly winning, and an intimidation game in which Amherst had the upper hand.

The last few ticks

As the first half began to wind down, Williams put on a strong offensive show behind Borden, Broadhurst and Kerry Mularczyk '93, and the Ephs backed up their shooting with a hard defense. Lucy never let up hustling, but had to take a break with three minutes remaining in the first half as she was visibly exhausted only lead, however, that Amherst would be permitted to enjoy. The Ephs women exploded into action at the encouragement of coach Nancy Roberts' constant instructions. As Williams struggled to get into gear, the Lord Jeffs began to get sloppy in their play. They lost the ball out of bounds and, subsequently, the lead on a huge fake and ensuing basket by Lucy.

Sparks fly in Chandler

From that point on, the teams got angrier and angrier. Every shot Williams tried to take was answered by a foul. The Ephs women had eight points in a row from the charity stripe as their only offensive strategy involved little but making the free throws.

Finally Broadhurst's ball-handling and quick hands, which had been a cog in the Amherst offense, helped the Ephs offensively, as she sank a huge three-point bucket. Mularczyk followed by regaining possession and putting up an easy lay-up in the face of Amherst defense.

With under two minutes left in the game, the Ephs were enjoying a 51-41 lead, and still scoring off foul shots. One by one all of Amherst's leading scorers began coming out of the game with five fouls. Amherst's Knight fouled out with 19 points, Luciani came out with ten, and Salineti, the tallest Lord Jeff, left the hardwood with eight points.

Lord Jeffs desperate

As it became clear that Amherst was going to lose, and their second string was forced onto the court, desperation made the Lord Jeffs increasingly vicious. The clock was stopped more often than it was running, but the Ephs refused to lose their cool, and maintained their tempers and their game to the end. As the last few seconds of the game were being played, Broadhurst intercepted an Amherst pass and sank the lay-up, putting the final touches on a 58-44 whipping.

Mularczyk led the team offensively with 16 points, followed closely by Broadhurst with 15 and Borden with 12. Lucy, who won the game defensively for Williams and set the offensive plays, came out with 8 points. The team also owed a great deal to Meg Brown '91 and her solid rebounding under the basket, and she ended with eight points.

Earlier in the week, Williams had put in another tough day's work, as they downed Trinity in a Tuesday night home duel. Despite the Bantams' hard offense and pressure defense, the Ephs women carried the day with a 67-51 victory.

Brown led the team with 23 points and an amazing game on the glass. Broadhurst, who tossed in 17 points and appeared unshakable from behind the three-point stripe, and Lucy, with 10 points and another solid defensive showing, also proved their value as they helped to overcome an impressive Bantam pressure defense.

The week's two wins brought the Ephs' record to 9-8. The Ephs women have improved since the season's early days in every aspect of their game and are only getting better with each game they play. They will try to parlay their recently established momentum into a third straight win as the Jumbos of Tufts come to town.

Swimmers tune up for New England's with solid win over R.P.I.

by Mike Lane

The men's swim team finished its season with a good-natured but to-the-point demolition of the RPI Engineers in Albany last Tuesday. The win served as the final meet for those not making the New England meets.

The Ephs were worried about facing a squad whose IQ's and endurance times were identical. It was with smooth, shaven legs and grins that Bryan Cameron '90, Matt Esposito '90, J.J. Cohen '92, Todd Lowe '92, Paul Krebs '93, Eric Swanson '92, Brad Cohen '92 and Glen Craner '91 swam their final races. The next time any of those boys wear shorts should be in mid-May.

The highlight of these swims had to be the traditional Lunch-bugger's 400M time trial, an arduous test of endurance and pointlessness by Esposito and Swanson, earning both places in the swim team's lunchbag hall of fame. Other highlights of the meet were the traditional captain's 200 butterfly, completed by senior co-captains Rob "Sticky" Benson and Mike Lane. Lane should be fully recovered sometime next week. The final tally of the meet blew the Engineer's supercomputer and was not available.

The team is now sharpening its spikes and its desire for the New England championships, which will be held March 2-4 at Williams.

Women prepare for postseason

The women's team is busy preparing for their New England, to be held this Friday through Sunday at Bowdoin. A strong squad characterized by youth, Williams has the best chance of any team in recent years to bring home some hardware. The divers, dominant all year, have exposed more potential point scorers than ever before, and are led by last year's champions Kathia Vandevonne '91 and Patty Althoff '92.

The distance crew, led by veteran Michelle Freeman '90, includes sophomore Kate Steinhilber and freshman Vanessa Gibbons. The breaststrokers include freshman sensation Ulla Piha and an impressive collection of sophomores, and the butterflyers are headed by sophomores Elizabeth Eberhart and Elizabeth Hickey, who have leapfrogged in posting record marks this year. The team graduated only one point scorer from last year's version, and has gained nine potential contributors, five of whom should easily place in the top eight.

Coach Carl Samuelson seemed optimistic as he said, "I hope we do real well. The enthusiasm is high and everyone is ready to travel to Brunswick." This sports writer, for one, picks the women as underdog victors who will bring home a trophy.

Athlete of the Week

This week's Athlete of the Week is junior downhill skier Jasou Priest, who stormed his way to the winner's platform twice in this weekend's Williams Winter Carnival. Priest, obviously enjoying the icy slopes of Brodie, won Friday's giant slalom and placed second in Saturday's slalom to lead the men to first place finishes in each event. Congrats, Jason!

Priest wins giant slalom; teammates take first throughout weekend

by Kevin Greenberg

Jason Priest '91 was the story of the Williams Winter Carnival as the junior won the giant slalom, placed second in the slalom and led the Eph skiers to team victories in both events.

"I was hoping we could pull it all together," said coach Ed Groes. "I was very pleased we were able to do that, especially at the home carnival."

Landon Seed '91, J.P. Parisien '90 and Eric Groes '91 helped to pull it together with top ten finishes in Friday's giant slalom, placing second, fourth, and eighth respectively. Kristian Omland '91 also raced well, finishing fifteenth.

In Saturday's slalom race Parisien repeated his fourth place finish while Seed placed eighth. Groes fell on his first run, effectively taking him out of the competition.

"Everyone knew we could win the carnival, but you can't expect it because you can always fall," explained Priest. "The season started off a little bit slow for me but now I'm starting to ski faster. [Parisien and Seed] could have skied even better, but Landon needed to finish so he could have a better seeding at the NCAA's."

While the men logged dual first place finishes, the women finished fourth in both races.

Amy Sullivan '91 was the top women's skier as she finished fifth in Friday's giant slalom and tenth in Saturday's slalom event. Ariana Groes '92 finished thirteenth in the giant slalom and was followed by Amy Beliveau '91 in fifteenth, Mika Wood '93 in 22nd, Amy Deehel '93 in 25th and Lauren Parkhill '93 in 35th.

Saturday, Beliveau finished fourteenth and Deehel finished 22nd. Parkhill fell on her first run. Groes fell on her second run, and Wood was disqualified for straddling a gate, a decision that Groes called "controversial."

"In the giant slalom we had one of our better races of the year. We're getting close to the third slot in the slalom. If we can get our whole team to stand up and ski fast we should have a good chance at third place," Groes said.

Both alpine squads will get their chance to show their stuff this weekend at the Eastern Championships at Middlebury and at the NCAA meet March 5 and 7 at Stowe, Vermont.

Amy Sullivan carves a turn in Saturday's giant slalom race. Sullivan posted a fifth-place finish on the day and added a tenth-place slalom performance to lift the women to fourth place on each day. Meanwhile, the men captured each race. (Balco)

Major leads 16-3 hoops squad past Lord Jeffs and Bantams

by Jeff Merritt

In front of a packed house at the Chandler Athletic Center on Saturday night, senior captain Garcia Major nailed a season-high 34 points to lead Williams to a 78-71 triumph over the Amherst Lord Jeffs. Amherst staged a valiant comeback in erasing a 15-point halftime deficit to knot the contest at 60-60, but the Ephs regrouped down the stretch to gain their sixth consecutive victory and the Little Three title.

Williams lifted its record to 16-3 on the season with this win and a satisfying 74-62 home victory earlier in the week over the Trinity Bantams.

Barrage of treys

The Ephmen seemed ready to send the Defectors fleeing back to Amherst in the first half, as an explosive Williams offense poured in seven three-point bombs on the way to a 49-34 halftime advantage.

Major and sophomore guard John Conte set the tone early from the perimeter. After Then Healy '91 opened the scoring with an inside bucket, the backcourt duo canned a pair of treys as the Ephs ran out to a quick 8-0 lead.

After grabbing a defensive rebound, Major brought the crowd to its feet with a stirring drive the length of the floor, giving Williams a 14-6 lead and resulting in an Amherst time-out at the 6:09 mark of the first half.

Major canned a three-pointer after the break, and a turnaround jumper from junior forward Jeffrey Miller extended the bulge to 10 points. Amherst kept in reach briefly with a few lay-ups and a short jumper, but the Williams offense continued to light up its half of the scoreboard.

Healy scored off a pass from senior Rich Williams, and then Conte and Major again launched a pair of back-to-back long range missiles to lift the margin to 34-18. Then Lindsey Vaughan '92 got hot for the Ephmen, tallying seven of the team's next 10 points, pausing only for Major's fourth three-point bomb of the half.

Conte buried his third trey in the final minute of the half, and the Ephs went to the locker room with a rather comfortable 15-point lead.

Eph offense cools down

"We knew we weren't better than them by 20 points, so we were expecting a run in the second half," Eph coach Harry Sheehy said after the contest. The run came early, but it was more a result of poor shooting from the Williams offense than a collapse by the defense.

The Ephmen managed only four points in the first 8:55 of the second half, allowing the Defectors to quickly cut the deficit to 53-50. Senior guard Josh Lipsky nailed a 15-footer to curtail a 16-4 Amherst run, and a pair of buckets from Miller and Major built the lead back to 60-54.

The Lord Jeffs scored the next six points on a pair of baskets from guard Adam Sedlik and a pair of free throws, tying the contest at 60 with 6:38 remaining. But the Ephmen would not be denied, as they outscored Amherst 18-7 over the next six minutes on the strength of 11 points from Major.

Ephs rise to the occasion

Healy was hacked viciously in the paint on the ensuing Williams possession, but he sank a pair from the charity stripe to push the Ephs back into the lead at 62-60. Major went to the line with the score at 65-63 and sank the first of his two attempts. He missed the second, but Healy grabbed the offensive rebound and fed it back to the captain who buried a jumper to push the lead to five points.

Major nailed a turnaround jumper with 2:15 remaining, making the score 70-65, and Healy came up big defensively on the next Amherst possession. The big man blocked a Lord Jeff shot to give the Ephs the ball, and Major sank a pair of free throws with 1:39 remaining to extend the lead to seven points.

Conte chipped in with a pair of buckets in the next minute, both of which resulted from goaltending charges against Amherst. The second of these made the score 77-67, and the Ephs built the lead to 11 on a Healy free throw before the Defectors scored a pair of inconsequential buckets in the final seconds.

Major scored 17 points in each half to lead the Ephmen on the evening, and he was followed by Conte with 13, and Healy with 11. Vaughan and Miller scored seven points apiece off the bench to help the Williams cause. Amherst dropped to 14-7 on the season.

Major now has 1569 career points as an Eph, leaving him only 57 points shy of Tim Walsh '86, the all-time scoring leader at Williams.

"When it came down to crunch time he wanted the ball and he wanted to take the shots," Sheehy said of Major. "He just wouldn't let us lose tonight."

Guards overpower Bantams

The backcourt tandem of Conte and Major combined for 43 points against Trinity on Wednesday night, leading the Ephmen to a comfortable 12-point victory over a team which defeated them twice last season and was the ECAC New England champion.

The Bantams boast the presence of senior center Michael Stubbs, one of the leading rebounders in the nation, listed at 6'8" and about the size of Lichtenstein. So Williams spent much of the night shooting from the perimeter, and the squad hit 46 percent from the floor on the night and

by Kerr Houston

This past Saturday I was awakened at the rather rude hour of 6:30 in the morning. No, I wasn't going jogging, and, no, I don't have a paper route. I was going to be a gatekeeper.

After a quick shower, a hearty breakfast and a lot of eye-rubbing, I made my way onto a big old purple and orange bus that promptly roared off, carrying about forty of us away from campus, and, more to the point, our beds.

Soon enough we were all standing at the base of Brodie Mountain, looking up at a white slope covered with a maze of blue and red flags. As some of the top skiers on the New England college circuit raced down the slope, warming up for the day's races, one question worked its way into my mind: when did we get the hot chocolate that we'd been promised?

My visions of Swiss Miss soon evaporated, though, as I got my gate assignment and began to hike up to my new hill. In my early morning wisdom, I'd put on my hiking boots, figuring that I'd neatly bolt up the mountain much as a Himalayan goat might do. Not quite. After spending about half an hour trying not to slide back into the parking lot, I finally hauled myself up the icy slope to the three gates that were my responsibility.

While I was still huffing and puffing, a kid with a shovel came prancing up to me in ski boots and offered to dig me a hole (which he referred to as my "house") closer to the gates. "Better view," he said. "All right," I said.

A couple of minutes later I was standing about twenty feet directly below gate #30, remembering the fantastic skiing accident in the old montage intro to Wide World of Sports and trying to dig an escape route to the side of the course.

My fears had to be put aside, though, as the women's slalom began in a light snow at 9:30. Although I was at first enthralled by the speedy, almost infallible downhillers and the sense of power that stemmed from my new position (or so I thought), I soon found myself glancing at my watch. I began dancing to the tunes that drifted up to my aching ears from the loudspeakers at the base of the hill in hopes of avoiding being named

by Kerr Houston

Neon uniforms and team vans popped up throughout the Village Beautiful last weekend as ski teams from throughout the Northeast gathered in Williamstown for the Williams Winter Carnival. In the midst of the colorful atmosphere, the Williams men's and women's Nordic teams turned in solid performances despite a virtual clinic by the powerful UVM squad.

In the women's 10km race, held on the Brodie Mountain trails on Friday, freshman standout Lindley Hall topped the Williams skiers with a 22:35.5 time that placed her in seventh. Ann Bokman '91 finished in 9th, in 22:50.8, and was followed by teammates Kim Bowes in 16th and Nikki Kimball in 17th. Senior captain Kirsten Froburg wound up in 25th, and junior Kris Hansen rounded out the Williams scoring with a 29th place showing. The Williams women finished in third, a spot that has become a familiar glove for the women's hand this winter, trailing only Dartmouth and a UVM squad that flexed its muscles by garnering the top three places in the race.

At Prospect Mountain on Saturday, Bowes, Hall and Froburg teamed up to place third in the 3x5km relay. Bowes clocked in with a scorching 18:58 and

Wrestlers seize Purple Pail, down Cardinals for first time in 27 years

by Augusto Torres

"Nothing could stop them from winning," said coach Roger Caron of his wrestling Little Three champs.

The Williams wrestling team took home the Little Three title for the first time in 27 years, beating Wesleyan 25-18 and destroying Amherst 39-7.

Having held a virtual lock on the Little Three through the eighties, Wesleyan was initiated harshly into the nineties by the Williams grapplers. Coach Caron had said it would be a match of strength. Wesleyan's upper-weight classes were their forte, while the lower-weight classes were Williams' strength.

The match against Wesleyan followed Caron's assessment. Williams took the five lower weight classes. Freshmen Bill Sullivan (118) and John Faciani (142) recorded pins. Senior captain Steve Felix (134) closely won a key match, triumphing 6-5. Sophomores Dylan Bloy (126) and Chris Gemignani (150) also came through for their team.

But the momentum was not always with Williams. Sophomore Jim Mawn (158) was no match for Walis, Wesleyan's top wrestler, and lost 8-0. Freshman Sean Rorke, usually solid at 177, was pinned. Caron said of Rorke's match, "It gave Wesleyan newly found confidence, and the momentum shifted."

A calculated risk?

In order to put Wesleyan away, Caron took a calculated risk. Needing at least another win from the heavier weights, Caron had sophomore Jack Morton, who usually wrestles 158, wrestle 190 to free Doug Dreffer '92, normally 190, to wrestle Wesleyan's heavyweight.

The reasons for this change, according to Dreffer, were that Wesleyan's 190-weight wrestler took second in New England last year, and coach Caron probably felt that Dreffer had a better chance against Wesleyan's bigger but less-talented heavyweight. The change paid off as Dreffer came through and edged his opponent 3-2.

Coach Caron said of the team's victory, "The win over Wesleyan was anticlimactic. The journey to be in a position to be able to beat them was exciting."

Williams easily retained "Purple Pail," which has passed to the winner of the yearly Amherst-Williams match since 1929. Sophomore Ivan Feron (118), Felix, and Gemignani recorded pins. Faciani won a tough match, 5-2, over Steven Pease, Amherst's best wrestler. "It was a clear-cut, decisive victory. We keep the Pail," Caron said simply.

Heading into New England with an 11-4 record, the team has accomplished much, according to Caron. So far, they have reached two of their three goals for the season in winning over 60 percent of their matches and taking the Little Three. The attainment of their third goal -- sending people to Nationals -- remains to be determined. The road to nationals is simple to explain. One wrestler from each weight class is sent from each competing team to the New England. The winners of each weight class at New England go to Nationals.

A question of how will go at 118 to New England remains to be settled between Feron and Sullivan. Both are excellent wrestlers who must wrestle-off to determine who goes. Caron said he sees very little difference between them.

CERTIFICATE OF AUTHENTICITY

This is to certify that the microphotographs appearing on this film-file are accurate and complete reproductions of the records of Williams College Archives + special collection as delivered in the regular course of business for photographing, starting with Newspapers - The Williams Record September 22, 1987 and ending with February 20, 1990

It is further certified that the microphotographic processes were accomplished in a manner and on film which meets with requirements of the National Bureau of Standards for permanent microphotographic copy.
